THREE POEMS

ANN GOLDSMITH

DRIVING BY THE RIVER

Yesterday I drove the Skyway in heavy fog: Haloes around the steel mills' paschal flames, Bridge abutments drifting like barges. Today
The trees are holding spring in their mouths.
Fishermen in a line thread themselves To themselves, gazing down; Gulls tear the air into scraps. Soon The shad will spawn as the tree with their name Floats its bronze-edged lace over old pastures.
The sweet carrion scent will draw the first midges.
Asparagus stalks will stand bundled Like dynamite in market bins,
And after them, the full-bellied melons.

It will be a good year for blueberries, Bad for corn and peas. Good for work; bad for sleep.
My father will not stoop among the marigolds Nor sing of harvest moons in the moth-grey dusk, Ash long on his cigar, his white floss hair Kindling under the porch light. The barn will be painted,
The path to the brook reinvented without him.
We will weed and prune, transplant in mid-summer, Let the hornets claim the last windfall.
The seasons arrange themselves.
Already in April we know Which roses were winter-killed, what crops will bear.
We know for whom this will be a hard year.

NOTHING IN LILAC HUES

Whoever you are, wrote the Austrian poet, step out of the house you know so well
into the infinite

and raise a tree there against the sky so you can look at it and for a moment know you have placed a new thought in the universe.

Here I am, I would like to reply, I am ready—but my thoughts are too watery to hold their shape especially against the sky and I'd lose my balance trying to raise even a bonsai or baby pear.

There was a day, late spring—the trail cut like a wire across a slope so sheer you could lean against glacial rubble on one side
while on the other

space came right up to your hiking boot.

Here, the cracks and grains of the up-slope grazed my shoulder
 streaming past my right eye like deer in a tunnel

while off to the left, nothing in lilac hues shook itself out for miles until it washed up against the far peaks.

And I had to sit down on bony ground until my soul came back to me for it's all very well to have one eye open on the back lot and the other on celestial courtyards when you're lying in bed or stepping through your tight doorframe but when you're newly married and climbing high with your husband and he's up ahead

and you've never done any of this before and the sky isn't pale anyway, but more like a cauldron, and you don't dare take your hand from the rock beside you, I say go ahead, look up and think what fine image you'd raise and how you would place it if you had a free hand, your man beside you, and swinging doors to every room

from here to timberline

but first, consider the wide planes of houses the rooted fragrance of forests—then get down to the valley floor any way you can.

NEGATIVE SPACE

The dark wind blows on everyone

—Tony Hillerman, Skinwalkers

is over the cliff under the wellspring under and over the thief's last words is bone shadows on a white sheet imprint of hoof in March mud a dark wind dragging us from the perches our fingers cling to.

Emptiness replete, it is the ragged outline of home where I went looking for you behind the mountains when wood lilies parted the grass.

ABOUT THE AUTHOR

Ann Goldsmith is a graduate of Smith College and holds a PhD from the University at Buffalo. She won the Quarterly Review of Literature Prize for her first book No One Is the Same Again in 1999, and published a second collection, The Spaces Between Us, in 2010. She has taught at several colleges in the Buffalo area and served as poet-in-residence at the Chautauqua Institution. She lives in Buffalo, New York.

Published in an edition of 300 copies, of which the first 50 have been numbered and
