

CHAPTER I.

The science of geography
Is different from biography:
Geography is about maps,
Biography is about chaps.

The rhyme might have been taken further to show how closely nevertheless these things are linked. For while maps are the biographical treatment of geography, biography is the geographical treatment of chaps. Chaps who are made the subjects of biography have by effort or by accident put themselves on the contemporary map as geographical features; but seldom have reality by themselves as proper chaps. So that Who's Who? though claiming to be a dictionary of biography is hardly less of a geographical gazeteer than Burke's Peerage..... One of the few simple people I have known who have had a philosophic contempt for such gazeteering was Old Joe, a battalion quartermaster in France. He was a proper chap. When he had won his D.S.O. for being the only quartermaster in the ^{Sixth} Division to get up rations to his battalion in the firing line at, I think, the Passchendaele show, he was sent a slip to complete with biographical details for the appropriate directory. He looked contemptuously at the various headings. Disregarding 'date and place of birth' and even 'military campaigns,' he filled in two items only --

Issue rum, rifles, etc.
Family Seat my ~~khaki~~ khaki pants.

And yet even proper chaps have their formal geography, however little it may mean to them. They have birth certificates, passports, relatives, earliest recollections and even sometimes degrees and publications and campaigns to itemize, like all the irrelevant people, the people with only geographical reality. And the less that all these biographical items mean to them the more particularly and faithfully can they fill them in, if even they feel so inclined. When loyalties have become negligible and friends have all either deserted in alarm or died, or been dismissed, or happen to be chaps to whom geography is also without significance, the task is easy^{for them}. They do not have to wait until they are at least ninety before publishing and even then only speak evil of characters long dead and without influential descendants.

The objects of this autobiography written at the age of thirty-three are simple:—money; an opportunity for a formal goodbye to you and to you and to you; forgetfulness, because once all this has been cleared up in my mind and written down and published it need never be thought about again.

As a proof of my readiness to accept biographical convention let me at once itemize my two earliest recollections. They are :- being held up to the window to watch a carnival procession for the Diamond Jubilee in 1897 (this was at Wimbledon, where I had been born on July 24, 1895); and, an earlier recollection still, looking up with a sort of despondent terror at a cupboard in the nursery which stood accidentally open and which was filled to the ceiling with octavo volumes of Shakespeare. My father was organiser of a Shakespeare reading circle. I did not know until long afterwards that it was the Shakespeare Cupboard, but I apparently had then a strong instinct against drawing-room activities. It is only recently that I have overcome my education and gone back to this early freedom.

When distinguished visitors came to the house like Sir Sidney Lee with his Shakespearean scholarship, and Lord Ashbourne, not yet a peer, with his loud talk of Ireland for the Irish and his saffron kilt, and Mr. Eustace Miles with his samples of edible nuts, I knew all about them in my way. I had summed up correctly and finally my uncle Charles of the Spectator and Punch, and my aunt Grace who came in a carriage and pair and whose arrival always caused a flutter because she was Lady Pontifex, and all the rest of my relations. And I had no illusions about Algernon Charles Swinburne who often used to stop my perambulator when he met it on Nurses' Walk at the edge of Wimbledon Common and pat me on the head and kiss me; he was an inveterate pram-stopper and patter and kisser. Nurses' Walk was on the way from "The Pines," Putney (where he lived with Watts-Dunton) and the Rose and Crown public house where he went for his daily pint of beer; Watts-Dunton allowed him twopence for that and no more. I did not know that Swinburne was a poet but I knew that he was no good. Swinburne, by the way, when a very young man went to Walter Savage Landor, then a very old man, and asked for and was given a poet's blessing; and Landor when a child had been patted on the head by Dr. Samuel Johnson; and Johnson when a child had been taken to London to be touched by Queen Anne for scrofula, the King's evil; and Queen Anne when a child.....

But I mentioned the Shakespeare reading circle. It went on for years and when I was sixteen curiosity finally sent me to one of the meetings. I remember the vivacity with which my mother read the part of Katherine in the Taming of the Shrew to my father's Petruchio and the compliments on their performance which the other members gave me. Mr. and Mrs. Maurice Hill were two of the most popular members of the circle. This meeting took place some years before they became Mr. Justice Hill and Lady Hill, and some years too before I looked into The Shrew. I remember the lemonade glasses, the cucumber sandwiches, the petits fours, the drawing-room knick-knacks, the chrysanthemums in bowls and the semi-circle of easy chairs around the fire. The gentle voice of Mr. Maurice Hill as Hortentio was admonishing my father, "Thou go thy ways, thou hast tamed a cursed shrew." I myself as Lucio was ending the performance with, "'Tis a wonder by your leave she will be tamed so." I must go one day to hear him speak his lines as Judge of the Divorce Courts; his admonishments have become famous.

After earliest recollections I should perhaps give a passport description of myself and let the items enlarge themselves. Date of birth... Place of birth... I have given those. Profession. In my passport I am down as 'University Professor.' That was a convenience for 1926 when I first took ~~the passport~~^{it} out. I thought of putting 'writer,' but people who are concerned with passports have complicated reactions to the word. 'University Professor' wins a simple reaction—dull respect. No questions asked. So also with 'Army captain (pensioned list)'.

My height is given as six feet two inches, my eyes as grey, and my hair as black. To 'black' should be added 'thick and curly.' I am described as having no special peculiarity. This is untrue. For a start there is my big, once aquiline, now crooked nose. I broke it at Charterhouse playing rugger with soccer players. (I broke another player's nose myself in the same game.) That unsteadied it, and boxing sent it wandering. Finally it was operated on. It is very crooked. It was once useful as a vertical line of demarkation between the left and right sides of my face which are naturally unassorted — my eyes, eyebrows and ears being all set noticeably crooked and my cheek-bones, which are rather high, being on different levels. My mouth is what is known as 'full' and my smile is crooked; when I was thirteen I broke my two front teeth and became sensitive about showing them. My hands and feet are large. I weigh about twelve-stone four. My star turn is a double-jointed pelvis. I can sit on a table and rap like the Fox sisters with it. One shoulder is distinctly lower than the other, but that is because of a lung wound in the war. I do not carry a watch because I always magnetise the main spring; during the war, when there was an army order that officers should carry watches and synchronise them daily, I had to buy two new ones every month. Medically, I am a thoroughly 'good life'.

My passport gives my nationality as 'British Subject.'^o Here I might parody Marcus Aurelius, who begins his Golden Book with the various ancestors and relations to whom he owes the virtues of a worthy Roman Emperor. Something of the sort about myself, and why I am not a Roman Emperor or even, except on occasions, an English gentleman. My mother's father's family, the von Ranke's was a family of Saxon country pastors, not anciently noble. Leopold von Ranke, the first modern historian, my great-uncle, brought the "von" into the family. To him I owe my historical habit. It was he who wrote, to the scandal of his colleagues: "I am a historian before I am a Christian: my object is simply to find out how the things actually occurred" and, of Michelet the French historian, "He wrote history in a style in which the truth could not be told." Thomas Carlyle decried him as 'Dry-as-Dust': to his credit. To Heinrich von Ranke, my grandfather, I owe my clumsy largeness, my endurance, energy, seriousness and my thick hair. He was rebellious and even atheistic in his youth. As a medical student at a Prussian University he was involved in the political disturbances of 1848. He and a number of student friends demonstrated in favour of Karl Marx at the time of his trial for high treason. Like Marx, they had to leave the country. He came to London and finished his medical course there. In 1859 he went to the Crimea with the British Forces as a regimental surgeon. All I know about this is a chance remark that he made to me as a child; "It is not always the big bodies that are the strongest. When I was at Sevastopol in the trenches I saw the great British guards crack up and die by the score, while the little sappers took no harm." Still, his big body carried him very well.

He married in London my grandmother, a Schleswig-Dane. She was the daughter of Tiarks, the Greenwich astronomer. She was tiny, saintly, frightened. Before her father took to astronomy the Tiarks family had, it seems, followed the Danish country system, not at all a bad one, of alternate professions for father and son. The odd generations were tin-smiths and the even generations were pastors. My gentler characteristics trace back to my grandmother. She had ten children; the eldest of these was my mother, who was born in London. My grandfather's atheism and radicalism sobered down. He eventually returned to Germany where he became a well-known children's doctor at Munich. He was about the first doctor in Europe to insist on clean milk for his child patients. When he found that he could not get clean milk to the hospitals by ordinary means he started a model dairy-farm himself. His agnosticism grieved my grandmother; she never ceased to pray for him, but concentrated more particularly on saving the next generation. She was a Lutheran. My grandfather did not die entirely unregenerate; his last words were, "The God of my fathers, to him at least I hold." I don't know exactly what he meant by that, but it was a statement consistent with his angry patriarchal moods, with his acceptance of a prominent place in Bavarian society as Herr Geheimrat Ritter von Ranke, and with his loyalty to the Kaiser, with whom once or twice he went deer-shooting. It meant, practically, that he was a good Liberal in religion as in politics and that my grandmother need not have worried. I prefer my German relations to my Irish relations; they have high principles, are easy, generous and serious. The men have fought duels not for cheap personal honour, but in the public interest - called out for example because they have protested publicly against the scandalous behaviour of some superior officer or official. One of them who was in the German consular service lost seniority, just before the war, I was told, because he refused to use the consulate as a clearing-place for secret-service reports. They are not heavy drinkers either. My grandfather as a student at the regular university "drunks" was in the habit of pouring his beer down into his eighteen-fortyish riding-boots. His children were brought up to speak English in their home and always looked to England as the home of culture and progress. The women were noble and patient.

At the age of eighteen my mother was sent to England as companion to ~~an~~ ^{a lovely} old woman who had befriended my grandmother when she was an orphan. For seventeen years she waited hand and foot on this old lady who for the last few years was perfectly senile. When she finally died my mother determined to go to India after a short training as a medical missionary. This ambition was baulked by her meeting my father, a widower with five children: it was plain to her that she could do as good work on the home mission field.

About the other side of my family. The Graves have a pedigree that fakes back to the Conquest, but is good as far as the reign of Henry VII. Colonel Graves, the regicide, who was Ireton's chief of horse was the founder of the Irish branch of the family. Limerick was its centre. There were occasional soldiers and doctors in it, but they were collaterals: in the direct male line was a sequence of rectors, deans, and bishops. The Limerick Graves have no "hands" or mechanical sense; instead they have a ~~wide~~^{wide} reputation as conversationalists. In those of my relatives who have the family characteristics most strongly marked, unnecessary talk is a nervous dis~~order~~^{order}. Not bad talk as talk goes; usually informative, often witty, but it goes on and on and on and on and on. The von Ranke's have, I think, little mechanical aptitude either. It is most inconvenient to have been born into the age of the internal combustion engine and the electric dynamo and to have no sympathy with them; a push-bicycle, a primus-stove and an army-rifle mark the bounds of my mechanical capacity.

My grandfather on this side was protestant Bishop of Limerick. He had eight, or was it ten, children. He was a little man and a remarkable mathematician; he first formulated some theorem or other of ~~conics~~^{spherical}. He was also an antiquary, and discovered the key to ancient Irish Ogham script. He was hard and ~~far~~^{by reputation,} far from generous. A gentleman and a scholar and respected throughout the countryside on that account. He and the catholic Bishop were on the very best terms. They cracked Latin jokes at each other, discussed fine points of scholarship, and ~~were~~^{were} ~~not~~^{unclerical enough} take their religious differences too seriously.

~~possibly been~~
~~When~~ When I was in Limerick as a soldier of the garrison some twenty-five years after my grandfather's death I heard a lot about Bishop Graves from the townsfolk.

The catholic Bishop had once joked him about the size of his family and my grandfather had retorted warmly with the text about the blessedness of the man who has his quiver full of arrows, to which the catholic answered briefly and severely, "The ancient Jewish quiver only held six." My grandfather's wake, they said, was the longest ever seen in the town of Limerick; it stretched from the Cathedral right down O'Connell Street and over Sarsfield Bridge, and I don't know how many miles-Irish beyond. He blessed me when I was a child, but I do not remember that.

Of my father's mother, who was a Scotswoman, a Cheyne from Aberdeen, I have been able to get no information at all beyond the fact that she was a "very beautiful woman." I can only conclude that most of what she said or did passed unnoticed in the rivalry of ^{family} conversations. The Cheyne pedigree was better than the Graves; it was flawless right back to the mediaeval Scottish Kings, to the two Balliols, the first and second Davids and the Bruce. In later times the Cheynes had been doctors and physicians. But my father is engaged at the same time as myself on his autobiography and no doubt he will write ^{at length} about all this. .

My father, then, met my mother some time in the early 'nineties. He had previously been married to one of the Irish Coopers, of Cooper's Hill near Limerick. The Coopers were an even more Irish family than the Graves, and this is how they started. When Cromwell came to Ireland and ravaged the country the story is that Moira O'Brien, the last surviving member of the great clan O'Brien, who were the paramount chiefs of the country round Limerick, came to him one day and said, "General, you have killed my father and my uncles, my husband and my brothers. I am left as the sole heiress of these lands. Do you intend to confiscate them?" Cromwell is said to have been struck by her magnificent presence and to have answered that that certainly had been his intention. But that she could keep her lands, or a part of them, on condition that she married one of his officers. And so the officers of the regiment who had taken a leading part in hunting down the O'Briens were invited to take a pack of cards and out for the privilege of marrying Moira and succeeding to the estate. The winner was one Ensign Cooper. Moira, a few weeks after her marriage, found herself pregnant. Convinced that it was a male heir, as indeed it proved, she kicked her husband to death. It is said that she kicked him in the pit of the stomach after making him drunk. The Coopers ^(and Hibernia's ipso Hiberniores) have always been a haunted family. ^{Jane} Cooper whom my father married died of consumption.

The Graves family was ^{thin-nosed and inclined to petulance but} never depraved or cruel or hysterical. ~~It was~~ ~~very~~. A ^{persistent} literary tradition: of Richard, a minor poet and friend of Shenstone, and ^{John} Thomas who was a ^{mathematician or jurist} ~~mathematician or jurist~~, and ^{Richard a divine's regius professor of Greek, or James an archaeologist,} ~~Robert~~ and Robert who ~~invented the disease called after him and was a~~ ^{and Richard another divine and Robert another divine,} friend of Wordsworth's, and other Robert's, James's, ^{Richard's} Thomases, and Clarissa, one of the toasts of Ireland, who married Leopold von Ranke, the historian, and muddled up the Graves and von Ranke's family connections a couple of generations before my father and mother married. See the British Museum catalogue for an eighteenth and nineteenth century record of Graves literary history.

It was through this Clarissa-Leopold relationship that my father met my mother. My mother told him at once that she liked Father O'Flynn, for writing which my father will be chiefly remembered. He put the words to a traditional jig tune The Top of Cork Road which he remembered from his boyhood. Sir Charles Stanford supplied a few chords for the setting. My father sold the complete rights for a guinea. The publisher made thousands. Sir Charles Stanford, who drew a royalty as the composer, also made a very large sum. Recently my father has made a few pounds from gramophone rights. He has never been bitter about all this but he has more than once impressed on me almost religiously never to sell ^{for a sum down} the complete rights of any work of mine whatsoever.

I am glad in a way that my father was a poet. This at least saved me from any false reverence of poets, and his work was never an oppression to me. I am even very pleased when I meet people who know his work and not mine. Some of his songs I sing without prejudice; when washing up after meals or shelling peas ^{or on similar} occasions. ~~He~~ never once tried to teach me how to write or showed any understanding of my serious work; he was always more ready to ask advice about his own work than to offer it for mine. He never tried to stop me writing and was glad of my ^{first} ~~early~~ successes. His light-hearted early work is the best. His Invention of Wine for instance which begins :-

*Ere Bacchus could talk
Or dacently walk, Down Olympus he jumped
From the arms of his nurse.
And though ten years in all
Were consumed by the fall
He might have fallen further
And fared a dale worse.*

After he married my mother and became a convinced teetotaler he lost something of this easy playfulness.

He broke the ecclesiastical sequence. His great-grandfather had been a dean, his grandfather a rector, his father a bishop, but he himself was never more than a lay-reader. And he broke the geographical connection with Ireland, for which I cannot be too grateful to him. I am much harder on my relations and much more careful of associating with them than I am with strangers. But I can in certain respects admire my father and mother. My father for his simplicity and persistence and my mother for her seriousness and strength. Both for their generosity. They never bullied me or in any way exceeded their ordinary parental rights and were grieved rather than angered by my default from religion. In physique and general characteristics my mother's side is stronger in me on the whole, but I am subject to many habits of speech and movement characteristic of the Graves, most of them eccentric. Such as finding it difficult to walk straight down a street, getting tired of sentences when half-way through and leaving them in the air, walking with the hands folded in a particular way behind the back, and being subject to sudden and most disconcerting spells of complete amnesia. These fits as far as I can discover, serve no useful purpose, and the worst about them is that they tend to produce in the subject the same sort of dishonesty that deaf people have when they miss the thread of conversation. They dare not be left behind and rely on their intuition and bluff to get them through. This disability is most marked in very cold weather. (I do not now talk too much except when I have been drinking or when I meet someone who was with me in France.) The Graves have good minds for purposes like examinations, writing graceful Latin verse, filling in forms and solving puzzles: (when we children were invited to parties where guessing games and brain-tests were played we never failed to win.) They have a good eye for ball games, and a graceful style. I inherited the eye, but not the style; my mother's family are entirely without style and I went that way. (I have an ugly but fairly secure seat on a horse) x There is a coldness in the Graves which is anti-sentimental to the point of ~~bliss~~ insolence, a necessary check to the goodness of heart from which my mother's family suffers. The Graves, it ~~is~~ ^{is} fair to generalise, though loyal to the British governing class to which they belong, and so to the Constitution, are individualists; the von Ranke's regard their membership of the corresponding class in Germany as a sacred trust enabling them to do the more responsible work in the service of humanity. Recently when a von Ranke entered a film studio the family felt that it was being somewhat disgraced.

The most useful and at the same time most dangerous gift that I owe to my father's side of the family - probably more to the Cheynes than the Graves - is that I am always able, when it is a question of dealing with officials or getting privileges from public institutions which grudge them, to masquerade as a gentleman. Whatever I happen to be wearing; and because the clothes I wear are not what gentlemen usually wear and yet I do ~~not~~ ^{not} seem to be an artist or effeminate, and my accent and gestures are irreproachable, I have even been 'placed' as the heir to a dukedom, whose perfect confidence in his rank would explain all such eccentricity. In this way I have been told that I seem, paradoxically, to be more of a gentleman even than one of my elder brothers who spent a number of years as a Consular official in the Near East. His wardrobe is ~~almost~~ ^{almost} too carefully a gentleman's and he does not allow himself the pseudo-ducual privilege of having disreputable acquaintances and ~~man~~ ^{on all occasions} saying what he really means. ~~man~~

About this being a gentleman business. ~~is that~~ I suffered so much in the fourteen years of my gentleman's education that I feel entitled occasionally to get some sort of return ~~for all that~~.

CHAPTER II.

My mother married my father largely, it seems, to help him out with his five motherless children. Having any herself was a secondary consideration. But first she had a girl, then she had another girl, and it was ~~very nice of course to have them but~~ slightly disappointing because she belonged to the generation and the tradition that made a son the really important event: then I ^{came} ~~was born~~ and I was a fine healthy ^{child.} ~~child.~~ Four years later she had another son and four years later she had another son ~~that was enough~~. The ^{desired} ~~preponderance~~ of male over female was established and twice five made ten. ^{she} ~~My mother~~ was forty when I was born and my father was forty-nine. ~~The~~ gap of two generations between ^{my parents} ~~my mother~~ and me was easier in a way to bridge than a single generation gap. Children seldom quarrel with their grandparents, and I have been able to think of my mother and father as grandparents. Also, a family of ten means a dilution of parental affection; ~~the~~ ^{the} members ^{tend to} ~~become indistinct.~~ I have often been called, "Philip, Richard, Charles, I mean Robert."

My father was a very busy man, an inspector of schools for the Southwark district ^{of London} and we children saw practically nothing of him except during the holidays. Then he was very sweet and playful and told us stories with the formal beginning, not "once upon a time" but always "and so the old gardener blew his nose on a red pocket handkerchief." He occasionally played games with us, but for the most part when he was not doing educational work he was doing literary work or being president of literary or temperance societies. My mother was so busy running the household and conscientiously carrying out her social obligations as my father's wife that we ~~did not see her continuously~~ unless on Sunday or when we happened to be ill. We ^{had a nurse and we} ~~had~~ had each other and that was ^{companionship} ~~enough~~ enough.

My father's chief part in our education was to insist on our speaking grammatically, pronouncing words correctly and using no slang. He left our religious instruction entirely to my mother though he officiated at family prayers, which the servants were expected to attend every morning before breakfast. Punishments, such as being sent to bed early or being stood in the corner, were in the hands of my mother. Corporal punishment, never severe and given with a slipper, was my father's business.

We learned to be strong moralists and spent a great deal of our time on self-examination and good resolutions.

My sister Rosaleen ^{put up a printed notice in her corner of the nursery} ~~made a note~~ ^{it} ~~might just~~ as well have been ^{put up} ~~by me~~ by me: - ~~"I must not say Bang Bust or Pig Bucket, for it is rude."~~

H We were given very little pocket-money, a penny a week with a rise to twopence at the age of twelve or so, and we were encouraged to give part at least of any odd money that came to us from uncles or other visitors to Dr. Barnardo's Homes and, this frightened us a bit, to beggars. (There was one blind beggar ^{at Wimbledon} who used to sit on the pavement reading the Bible aloud in Braille; he was not really blind but able to turn his eyes up and keep the pupils concealed for minutes at a time under drooping lids which were artificially inflamed. ^{We often gave to him} He died a very rich man and had been able to ^{provide} ~~provide~~ his son ^{with} a college education.)

16 B

that I remember meeting

The first distinguished writer [redacted] after Swinburne was P. G. Wodehouse, a friend of one of my brothers; he was in the early twenties, on the staff of the Globe, and was writing [redacted] school stories in the Captain Magazine. He gave me a penny. I was too shy to express my gratitude at the time.

[redacted] (I felt it strongly and) but have not for these thirty years let anyone say a bad word against his work in my presence.

[Large section of text redacted with thick black bars]

I had great religious [redacted] fervour which [redacted]

it persisted until shortly after my confirmation at the age of sixteen. I remember the incredulity with which I first heard that there actually were people, people baptised like myself into the Church of England, who did not believe in Jesus.

[redacted]

I never met an unbeliever in all these years. As soon as I did, it was all over with my simple faith. This was bad luck on my parents but they were doomed to it. One married couple that I ^{belonging to the same generation} knew/decided that the best way in the end to ensure a proper religious attitude/ was not to teach ^{him in} their children any religion at all until they were able to understand it in some degree of fulness. The children were sent to schools where no religious training was given. At the age of thirteen the eldest boy came indignantly to his father and said, "Look here, father, I think you've treated me very badly. The other chaps laugh at me because I don't know anything about God. And who's this chap Jesus? When I ask them they won't tell me, they think I am joking." So the long hoped for moment had arrived. The father told the boy to call his sister, who was a year younger than him, because he had something very important to tell them both. Then very reverently and carefully he told them the Gospel story. ~~He~~ He had ^{always} planned to tell it to them, ^{in this way.} ~~in this way.~~ ~~and under the~~. The children did not interrupt him. When finally he had finished there was a silence. Then the girl said rather embarrassed, "Really, father, I think that is the silliest story I've heard since I was a kid." The boy ^{said, "Poor chap! But what about it anyhow?"} ~~said, "Poor chap! But what about it anyhow?"~~ I have ^{many of my acquaintances} asked ~~at~~ at what point in their childhood or adolescence they became class-conscious but have never been given a satisfactory answer. I remember when it happened to me. When I was four and a half I caught scarlet fever; my younger brother had just been born and it was impossible for me to have scarlet fever in the house, so I was sent off to a public fever hospital. There was only one other bourgeois child in the ward; the rest were all proletarians. I did ^{not} notice particularly that the attitude of the nurses or the other patients to me was different; I accepted their kindness and ^{spoiling easily} ~~because I was accustomed to it.~~ ~~because I was accustomed to it.~~ But I was astonished at the respect and even reverence that this ^{other} little boy, a clergyman's child, was given. "Oh," the nurses would cry after he had gone, "Oh", they cried, "he did look a little gentleman in his pretty white pellisse when they came to take him away." "He was a fair toff" echoed the little proletarians. When I came ~~from~~ ^{home from} the hospital after being there about two months, my accent was commented on and I was told that the boys in the ward had been very vulgar. I did ~~not~~ ^{not} know what "vulgar" meant; it had to be explained to me. About a year later I met Arthur, a boy of about nine, who had been in the ward and taught me how to play cricket when I was getting better; I was then at my first preparatory school and he was a ragged errand boy. In hospital we had all worn the same hospital nightgown and I had ~~not~~ realised that we came off such different shelves ~~but now~~ ^{But now} I suddenly recognised with my first shudder of gentility that there were two sorts of people ^{ourselves} and the lower classes. The servants ~~in the hospital~~ were trained to call us children, even when we were tiny, Master Robert, Miss Rosaleen, and Miss Clarissa, but I had not realised that these were titles. ^{Respect} I had thought of "Master" and "Miss" merely as vocative prefixes used when addressing other people's children. But now I realised that the servants were the lower classes, and we were ourselves.

I accepted this class ~~separation~~ ^{separation} as naturally as I had accepted religious dogma, and did not finally discard gentility until nearly twenty years later. My mother and father were never of the aggressive, shoot-'em-down type. They were Liberals or, more strictly, Liberal-Unionists. They treated their employees in religious theory at least as fellow-creatures. But social distinctions remained clearly [redacted] defined. That was religion too: "He made them high or lowly. And ordered their estates."

I can well recall the tone of my mother's voice when she [redacted] ^{informed} the ^{maids} [redacted] that they could have what was left of the pudding or scolded the ^{cook} [redacted] for some carelessness. It was a forced hardness, [redacted] [redacted] embarrassment [redacted] ^{My mother was gemütlich.} She would [redacted] believe ^{have} given a lot to be able to dispense with servants altogether.

They were like a foreign body in the house. I remember what the servants' bedrooms used to look like. [redacted] ^{By a convention of the times they were the} only rooms ^{in the house} that had no carpet or linoleum: they were on the top landing on the dullest side of the house. The gaunt, unfriendly-looking beds, and the hanging cupboards with faded cotton curtains instead of wardrobes with glass doors as in the other rooms. All this uncouthness made me ^{The type of servant that came was not very good; only those with not particularly high references would apply for a situation where there were ten in the family.} think of the servants as somehow not quite human. And because it was such a large house and there was ^{hardly} a single [redacted] tidy person in the household they [redacted] were constantly giving notice. There was too much work, they said. So that the tendency to think of them as only half human was increased; they never had time to get fixed as human beings.

The bridge between the servants and ourselves was our nurse. She gave us her own passport on the first day she came:- "Emily Dykes is my name: England is my nation: Netheravon is my dwelling place: And Christ is my salvation." [redacted] ^{though} she called us Miss and Master she spoke it in no servant tone. [redacted] ^{In a practical way} she was more to us than our mother. I began to despise her at about the age of twelve - she was then nurse to my younger brother - when I found that my education was now in advance of hers and that if I struggled with her I was able to trip her up and bruise her quite easily. Besides, she was a Baptist and went to chapel; I realised by that time that the Baptists were, like the Wesleyans and Methodists, the social inferiors of the members of the Church of England.

I was brought up with a horror of Catholicism and this remained with me for a very long time. It was not a case of once a Protestant always a Protestant, but rather that when I ceased to be Protestant I was further off than ever from being Catholic. I discarded Protestantism in horror of its Catholic element. My religious training developed in me a great capacity for fear (I was perpetually tortured by the fear of Hell) a ^{superstitious} conscience ~~which was~~ and a ^{sexual embarrassment.} ~~of my sex life.~~ I was very long indeed in getting rid of all this. Nancy and I (later on in this story) were most careful not to give our four children a religious training in the home. They were not even baptised.

The last thing that is discarded by Protestants when they reject religion altogether is a vision of Christ as the perfect man. That persisted with me ^{sentimentally for years}. At the age of nineteen I wrote a poem called "In the Wilderness". It was about Christ meeting the scapegoat, a quaint silly poem, and has appeared in at least seventy anthologies. ~~It has been~~ Its perpetual recurrence. Strangers are always writing to me to say what a beautiful poem it is and how much strength it has given them, and would I etc? Here, for instance, is a letter that came yesterday: -

"Sir, I heard with great delight your beautiful poem "In the Wilderness" broadcast from 2LO last night and am writing to you because your poem has given me strength and hope. I am a gentle lady in need - in great need - not of a gift, but of a LOAN, on interest of 5%. I also need a kind friend to show me human sympathy and to help me if possible by an introduction to a really upright and conscientious London solicitor who will fight my cause not

I put this in here because it is not a letter to answer, nor yet somehow a letter to throw away. The style reminds me of one of my Irish ^{female} cousins. And that again reminds me of the ~~Irish~~ Irish triad ^{of} "Three ugly Sisters: Chatter, Poverty and Chastity."

CHAPTER III.

I went to six preparatory Schools. The first was a dame's school at Wimbledon. I went there at the age of six. My father ^{as} an educational expert did not let me stay ^{well} long ~~because he decided that the method was~~. He found me crying one day at the difficulty of the twenty-three-times table, and there was a Question and Answer History Book that we used which began:

Question: "Why were the Britons so called?"

Answer: "Because they painted themselves blue."

My father said that it was out of date. Also I was made to do mental arithmetic to a metronome. I once wet myself for nervousness at this torture. So I went to the lowest class of King's College School, Wimbledon. I was just seven years old, the youngest boy there, and they went up to nineteen. I was taken away after a couple of terms because I was found to be using naughty words. I was glad to leave that school because I didn't understand a word of the lessons. I had started Latin and I didn't know what Latin was or meant; its declensions and conjugations were pure incantations to me. ^{In that matter so were the strings of naughty words.} And I was oppressed by the huge hall, the enormous boys, the frightening rowdiness of the corridors, and compulsory rugby football of which nobody told me the rules. I went from there to another preparatory school of the ordinary type, also at Wimbledon, where I stayed for about three years. Here I began playing games seriously, was quarrelsome, boastful and talkative, won prizes, and collected things. The only difference between me and the other boys was that I collected coins instead of stamps. ^{The value of coins seemed less fictitious to me than stamp-values.} My first training as a gentleman was here. I was only once caned, for forgetting to bring my gymnastic shoes to school, and ^{then} I was only given two strokes on the hand with the cane. Yet even now the memory makes me hot with fury. The principal outrage was that it was on the hand. My hands have a great importance for me and are unusually sensitive. I live a lot in them; my visual imagery is defective and so I memorise largely by sense of touch.

I seem to have left out a school. It was in North Wales, right away in the hills behind Llanbedr. It was the first time I had been away from home. I went there just for a term, for my health. Here I had my first beating. The headmaster was a parson, and he caned me on the bottom because I learned the wrong collect one Sunday by mistake. This was the first time that I had come upon forcible training in religion. (At my
~~_____~~
Jamie's school we learned collects too but were not punished for mistakes
~~_____~~
we competed for prizes - ornamental boxes to take home and hang
~~_____~~
over our beds.)
~~_____~~ But there was a boy at this school called Ronny and he was the greatest thing that I had ever met. He had a house at the top of a pine tree that nobody else could climb, and he had a huge knife, made from the top of a scythe that he had stolen; and he killed pigeons with a catapult and cooked them up in the tree. He was very kind to me; he went into the Navy afterwards and deserted on his first voyage and was never heard of again. He used to steal rides on cows and horses that he found in the fields. And I found a book that had the ballads of Chevy Chase ~~_____~~ and ~~_____~~ Sir Andrew Barton; ^{in it} they were the first two ^{real} poems that I ^{remember} ~~_____~~ read; and I saw how good they were. But on the other hand there was an open-air swimming bath where all the boys bathed naked and I was overcome by horror at the sight. There was one boy there of nineteen with red hair, real bad Irish red hair all over his body. I had not known that hair grew on bodies. And the Headmaster had a little daughter with a little girl friend and I was in a sweat of terror whenever I met them; because, having no brothers, they once tried to find out about male anatomy from me by exploring down my shirt-neck when we were digging up pig-nuts in the garden.

Another frightening experience of this part of my life was once when I had to wait in the school cloakroom for my sisters who went to the Wimbledon High School. We were going on to be photographed together. I waited about a quarter of an hour in the corner of the cloakroom. I suppose I was about ten ^{years old} and hundreds and hundreds of girls went to and fro, and they all looked at me and giggled and whispered things to each other. I knew they hated me because I was a boy sitting in the cloakroom of a girl's school, and when my sisters arrived they looked ashamed of me and quite different from the sisters I knew at home. I realised that I had blundered into a secret world and for months and even years afterwards my worst nightmares were of this girls' school, which was always filled with coloured toy balloons. Very Freudian, as one says now. My normal impulses were set back for years by these two experiences. When I was about seventeen we spent our Christmas holidays in Brussels. An Irish girl staying at the same pension made love to me in a way that I see now was really very sweet. I was so frightened I could have killed her.

P Yet In England ^{preparatory and public schools,}

~~_____~~
~~_____~~
~~_____~~
~~_____~~

Romance is necessarily homosexual. The opposite sex is despised and hated, treated as something [redacted] obscene. [redacted] Many boys [redacted] never recover from this perversion. I only recovered by a shock, at the age of twenty-one. For every one born homosexual there are at least ten permanent pseudo-homosexuals made by the ^{Public School} [redacted] system. And nine of the ten are as honourably chaste and sentimental as I was.

I left that day-school at Wimbledon because my father decided that the standard of work was not good enough ^{to enable me} [redacted] to ^{win} a scholarship at a public school [redacted]. He sent me to ^{another preparatory} [redacted] school at Rugby; because the Headmaster's wife was a sister of an old literary friend of his. It proved later that these were inadequate grounds. It was a queer [redacted] place and I ^{did not like} [redacted] it. There was a secret about the Headmaster which a few of the elder boys shared. It was somehow sinister, but I never exactly knew what it was. All I knew was that he came ^{weeping} [redacted] into the class-room one day beating his head with his fists and groaning "Would to God I hadn't done it! Would to God I hadn't done it!" I was taken away suddenly ^{a few days later, which was the end of the school year.} [redacted]. The Headmaster was said to be ill. I found out later that he had been given twenty-four hours to leave the country. He was a furtive bearded little man who used to eye us with great interest when we were having our baths, to make sure that we washed ourselves properly. He was succeeded by the second master, a good man who taught me how to write English by ^{eliminating all phrases} [redacted] that could be done without and using verbs and nouns instead of adjectives and adverbs wherever possible. And where to start new paragraphs and the difference between O and Oh. He was a very heavy man. He used to stand at his desk and lean on his thumbs until they bent at right angles. (The school he took over was now only half strength because of the scandal. A fortnight later he fell out of a train on to his head and that was the end of him; but the school is apparently going on still; I am occasionally asked to subscribe to Old Boys' funds for chapel windows and miniature rifle ranges and so on. On the credit side of the school reputation was Rupert Brooke's name on the Honours Board in the Gymnasium. I first learned rugger here. What surprised me most at this school was when a boy of about twelve whose mother and father were in India was told by cable that they had both suddenly died of cholera. We all watched him sympathetically for weeks after, expecting him to die of grief or turn black in the face or do something to match the ~~occasion~~ occasion. Yet he seemed entirely unmoved and since nobody dared discuss the tragedy with him he seemed to forget what had happened; he played about and ragged as he had done before. We found that rather monstrous. ^{But} ~~he could~~ he could not have been expected to ^{behave otherwise. He had not seen his} ~~realise what had happened.~~ ^{parents for two years. And} Preparatory school-boys live in a world completely dissociated from home life ~~at this level of education~~. They have a different vocabulary, different moral system, different voice, and though on their return to school from the holidays the change-over from home-self to school-self is almost instantaneous, the reverse process takes a fortnight at least. A preparatory school-boy when off his guard will often call his mother "Please, matron" and will always address any man relation or friend of the family as "Sir" as though he were a master. I used to do it. School life becomes the reality and home life the illusion. In England parents of the governing classes virtually finish all intimate life with their children from about the age of eight, and any attempt on their part to insinuate home feeling into school life is ~~resented~~ resented.

From this typically bad school I went to a typically good ^{school} in Sussex. The headmaster was chary of admitting me at my age particularly from a school with such a bad recent history. (However, family literary connections did the trick, and the headmaster saw that I was advanced enough to ^{win} a scholarship and do the school credit. The oppression of spirits that I had had at Rugby was lifted from the moment I arrived. My younger brother followed me to this school, being taken away from the ^{day-} school at Wimbledon, and later my youngest brother went there straight from home. How good and typical the school was can best be seen in the case of my youngest brother who is a typical, good, normal person, and as I say, went straight from home to the school without other school influences. He spent five or six years there and played in the elevens and got the top scholarship at a public school and became head-boy ~~at the school~~ ^{there} with athletic distinctions, and ~~won~~ a scholarship at Oxford and ~~won~~ ^{further} athletic distinctions and a degree, and then what did he do? Because he was such a typically good, normal, person he naturally went back as a master to his old typically good ^{preparatory} school, and now that he has been there some years and wants a change he is applying for a mastership at his old public school, and, if he gets it and becomes a house-master after a few years, he will at last I suppose, become a headmaster and eventually take the next step and become the head of his old college at Oxford. That is the sort of typically good preparatory school it was. At this school I learned to keep a straight bat at cricket and to have a high moral sense, and my fifth different pronounciation of Latin and my fifth or sixth different way of doing simple arithmetic. But I did ^{not} mind, and they put me in the top class and I got a scholarship, in fact I got the first scholarship of the year. At Charterhouse. And why Charterhouse? Because of $\epsilon\sigma\tau\eta\mu$ and $\epsilon\eta\mu$. Charterhouse was the only public school whose scholarship examination did not contain a Greek grammar paper, and though I was good enough at Greek Unseen and Greek Composition, I could not conjugate $\epsilon\sigma\tau\eta\mu$ and $\epsilon\eta\mu$ conventionally. If it had not been for these two verbs I would ~~have~~ ^{the very different atmosphere of} gone to Winchester.

~~_____~~

CHAPTER IV.

My mother ~~had taken~~^{took} us abroad to stay at my grandfather's house in Germany five times between my second and twelfth year. After this he died and we never went again. He had a big old house ten miles from Munich; it had ~~once~~^{at one} been a shooting-lodge of the Kings of Bavaria and was called Lafzorn, which means "Begone dull care!" Our summers there were easily the best things of my early childhood. Pine forests and hot sun, red deer and black and red squirrels, ~~and~~ acres of blue-berries and wild strawberries; nine or ten different kinds of edible mushrooms that we went into the forest to pick, and unfamiliar flowers in the fields - Munich is high up and there are outcrops of Alpine flowers here and there - and the farm with all the usual animals except sheep, and drives through the countryside in a brake behind my grandfather's greys. And bathing in the Iser under a waterfall; the Iser ~~was~~^{was} bright green and supposed to be the fastest river in Europe. We used to visit the uncles who had a peacock farm a few miles away, and a grand-uncle, Johannes von Ranke, the ethnologist, who lived on the lake-shore of Tegensee where everyone had buttercup-blonde hair. And occasionally my aunt Agnes, Baronin von Aufsess, who lived some hours away by train, high up in the Bavarian Alps, in Aufsess Castle.

This castle was a wonder: it was built in the eighth century and had been in the von Aufsess family ever since. The original building was a Keep with only a ladder-entrance half way up. A mediaeval castle had been added. Aufsess was so remote that it had never been sacked, and its treasures of plate and armour were amazing. Each baron added to the treasure and none took away. My uncle Siegfried was the heir. He showed us children the chapel with its walls hung with enamelled shields of each Aufsess baron impaled with the arms of the family into which he married. These families were always ~~of noble~~ noble. ~~He~~ ^{He} pointed to a stone in the floor which pulled up by a ring and said "That is the family vault where all we Aufsesses go when we die. I'll go there one day." He scowled comically. (But he was killed in the war as an officer of the Imperial German staff and I believe that they never found his body.)

He had a peculiar sense of humour. One day we children found him on the pebbled garden-path, eating the pebbles. He told us to go away, but of course we ~~would not~~ ^{would not}: we sat down and tried to eat pebbles too. He told us very seriously that eating pebbles was not a thing for children to do; we should break our teeth. We agreed after trying one or two; so to get rid of us he found us each a pebble which looked just like all the other pebbles but which crushed easily and had a chocolate centre. But this was only on condition that we went away and left him to his picking and crunching. When we came back later in the day we searched and searched, but only found the ordinary hard pebbles. He never once let us down in a joke.

^{TP} Among the treasures of the castle were a baby's lace cap that had taken two years to make and a wine glass that my uncle's father, who was the reigning baron, had found in the Franco-Prussian War standing upright in the middle of the square in an entirely ruined village. For dinner when we were there we had enormous trout. My father, who was a fisherman, was astonished and asked the baron how ~~it came to be~~ ^{they came to be} that size. ~~He~~ ^{The baron said} that there was an underground river that ~~came~~ ^{welled up} close to the castle and the fish that came out with it were quite white from the darkness, of enormous size and stone-blind. They also gave us jam made of roseberries which they called "Hetchi-Petch."

^{K1} The most remarkable thing in the castle was an iron chest in the top of the Keep. It was in a small room at the top. It was a huge chest, twice the size of the door ~~and~~ there were no windows but arrow-slits. ~~It~~ had obviously been made inside the room. It had two keys. I could ~~not~~ ^{not} say what its date was, but ~~it~~ ^{I recall it as} ~~was~~ twelfth or thirteenth century work. There was a tradition that it should never be opened unless the castle was in the most extreme danger. One key was held by the baron and one by the steward; I believe the stewardship was a hereditary office. The chest could only be opened by using both keys, and nobody knew what was inside; it was even considered unlucky to speculate. Of course we speculated. It might be gold, more likely it was a store of corn in sealed jars, or even some sort of weapon, Greek fire perhaps. From what I know of the Aufsesses and their stewards, it is inconceivable that ~~the~~^{the} chest ever got the better of their curiosity. The castle ghost was that of a former baron known as ~~the~~ The Red Knight; his terrifying portrait hung half-way up the turret staircase that took us to our bedrooms. We slept for the first time in our lives on feather beds.

My grandfather's house ^{a baronial mansion bought and} which he had ~~from~~^{from} a ruinous state ~~restored~~ had nothing ~~to~~ to compare with the Aufsess tradition. It is true that there were two ghosts that went with the place; the farm labourers used to see them frequently. One of them was a carriage which drove furiously along without any horses, and before the days of motor-cars this was frightening enough. And the banqueting hall was magnificent. I have not been there since I was a child so it is impossible for me to recall its true dimensions. It seemed as big as a cathedral, and its bare boards were only furnished at the four corners with little islands of tables and chairs. The windows were of stained glass and there were swallows' nests all along where the walls joined the ceiling. Roundels of coloured light from the stained-glass windows, the many-tined stag's heads that my grandfather had shot mounted on the wall, swallow-droppings on the floor under the nests and a little harmonium in one corner where we sang German songs; these concentrate my memories of ~~_____~~ ^{Laufzorn}

~~_____~~. It was in three divisions. The bottom storey was part of the farm. ~~_____~~ ^{A carriage drive} ~~_____~~ ^{(went right} through it and there was also a courtyard ~~_____~~ ^{with covered - originally there} ~~_____~~ ^{had served for but up the cattle to safety in times of baronial feud.}

~~_____~~ On one side of the carriage drive was the Estate Steward's rooms and offices, on the other the farm servants' inn and kitchen. In the middle storey lived my grandfather and his family. The top storey was a store-place for corn and apples and other farm produce. It was up here that my cousin Wilhelm, who was also killed ^{as an airman} in the war ~~_____~~

~~_____~~ used to lie for hours shooting mice with an air-gun. (I learned ^{that he was shot down by a schoolfellow of mine.})

The best part of Germany was the food. There was a richness and spiciness about it that we missed in England. We liked the rye bread, the black honey (black I believe because it came from the combs of the previous year), the huge ice-cream puddings made with fresh raspberry juice, and the venison, and the honey cakes, and the pastries, and particularly the sauces made with ^{different sorts of} mushrooms ~~_____~~

~~_____~~ And the bretzels, and carrots cooked with sugar, and summer pudding ~~_____~~ ^{of} cranberries and blueberries. There was an orchard ~~_____~~ close to the house and we could eat as many apples, pears and greengages as we liked. There were rows of blackcurrant and gooseberry bushes. ~~_____~~

~~_____~~ perfect place. The estate, in spite of the recency of my grandfather's tenure and his liberalism and experiments in modern agricultural methods was still feudalistic. The farm servants, because they talked a dialect that we could ^{not} understand and because they were catholics and poor and ~~_____~~ ^{sweaty} and savage-looking, frightened us. They were lower even than the servants at home, and as for the colony of Italians settled about half a mile from the house, imported from Italy by my grandfather as cheap labour for his brick making factory, we associated them in our minds with the "gypsies in the wood" of the song. My grandfather took us there one day; he made me taste a lump of Italian polenta. My mother told me afterwards ~~_____~~ ^{(when a} ~~_____~~ milk-pudding at Wimbledon ~~_____~~ came to table burnt and ~~_____~~ we complained about ^{it} "those poor Italians at the factory used to burn their polenta on purpose sometimes just for a change of flavour."

There were other ~~_____~~ ^{unusual} things at Laufzorn. There was a large pond full of carp; it ~~_____~~ ^{was} netted every ^{three or four} year. The last year we were there we were allowed to help. It was ~~_____~~ ^{good} to see the net pulled closer and closer to the shallow landing corner. It bulged with wriggling carp and a big pike was threshing about among them. I was allowed to wade in to help and came out with six leeches like black rubber tubes fastened to my legs; salt had to be put on them to make them leave go. I ~~_____~~ ^{do not} remember that it hurt much. The farm labourers were excited and one of them, called the Jackal, gutted a fish with his thumbs and ate it raw. And there was the truck line between the railway station, two miles away, and the brick-yard. There was a fall of perhaps one in a hundred from the factory to the station. The Italians used to load up the trucks with bricks and a squad of them would give the trucks a ~~_____~~ ^{hard} push and run along the track pushing for about twenty or thirty yards; and then the trucks used to sail off all by themselves to the station. There was a big hay-barn where we were allowed to climb up on the rafters and jump down into the springy hay; we gradually increased the height of the jumps. It was exciting to feel our insides left behind us in the air. Then the cellar, not the ordinary beer cellar, but another that you went ^{down} into from the courtyard. It was quite dark ~~there~~ except for a little slit-window; and there was a heap of potatoes on the floor. (They had put out long ^{white feelers} ~~to feel for the light~~) To get ~~us~~ ^{to} ~~that~~ light ~~with such~~ ^{a twisted} ~~mass~~. In one corner ~~of the cellar~~ there was a dark hole closed by a gate; it was a secret passage out of the house to a ruined monastery, a mile or two away. My uncles had once been down some way but the air got bad and they had come back. The gate had been put up to prevent anyone else trying it and being overcome.

When we drove out with my grandfather he was ~~acclaimed~~ by the principal personages of every village we went through. At each village there was a big inn with a rumbling skittle-alley and always a tall maypole banded like a barber's pole with blue and white, the Bavarian National colours.

The roads were lined with fruit trees. The idea of these unguarded public fruit trees astonished us. We could ~~not~~ ^{not} understand why there was any fruit left on them. Even the horse-chestnut trees on Wimbledon Common were pelted with sticks and stones, long before the chestnuts were ripe and in defiance of an energetic common keeper. The only things that we could ~~not~~ ^{not} quite get accustomed to in Bavaria were the wayside crucifixes with the realistic blood and wounds, and the exvoto pictures, like sign-boards, of naked souls in purgatory grinning with anguish in the middle of high red and yellow flames. We had been taught to believe in hell, but did not like to be reminded of it. Munich we found sinister. Disgusting fumes of beer and cigar smoke and ^{intense} ^{of eating, the} ~~sounds~~ ~~of~~ ~~the~~ ~~city~~ ~~at~~ ~~night~~

~~and~~ the hotly dressed, enormously stout population in the trams and trains, ~~the~~ ~~the~~ ~~the~~ ~~the~~ the furious officials, ~~the~~ ~~the~~ ~~the~~ ~~the~~ ~~the~~ ~~the~~ ~~the~~ ~~the~~ ~~the~~ wanton crowds ~~the~~ ~~the~~ ~~the~~ ~~the~~ ~~the~~ ~~the~~ ~~the~~ ~~the~~ ~~the~~ picture galleries, ~~the~~ ~~the~~ ~~the~~ ~~the~~ ~~the~~ ~~the~~ ~~the~~ ~~the~~ ~~the~~
~~the~~ ~~the~~ ~~the~~ ~~the~~ ~~the~~ ~~the~~ ~~the~~ ~~the~~ ~~the~~ ~~the~~
~~the~~ ~~the~~ ~~the~~ ~~the~~ ~~the~~ ~~the~~ ~~the~~ ~~the~~ ~~the~~ ~~the~~ Then there was the Morgue. We were not allowed inside because we were children, but it was bad enough to be told about it. Any notable who died was taken to the Morgue and put in a chair, sitting in state for a day or two, and if he was a general he had his uniform on, or if she was a burgomaster's wife she had on her silks and jewels; and strings were tied to their fingers and the slightest movement of one of the strings would ring a great bell, in case there was any life left in the corpse after all. I ^{have} never verified the truth of all this but it was true enough to me. When my grandfather died about a year after our last visit I thought of him there in the Morgue with his bushy white hair and his morning coat and striped trousers and his decorations and his stethoscope and perhaps, I thought, his silk hat, gloves and cane on a table beside the chair. Trying in a nightmare to be alive but knowing himself dead.

The headmaster who caned me on the hand was a lover of German culture and impressed this feeling on the school, so that it was to my credit that I could speak German and had been to Germany. At my other preparatory schools this German connection was regarded as something at least excusable and perhaps even interesting. It was not until I went to Charterhouse that I was made to see it as a social offence. My history from the age of fourteen when I went to Charterhouse to just before the end of the war when I began to realise things better was a ~~forced~~ rejection of the German in me. (I used ^{to insist} indignantly) In all that first period to ~~say~~ that I was Irish and ~~deliberately cultivate~~ ~~Irish sentiment.~~

I took my self-protective stand on the technical point that it ^{was} the father's nationality that counted. But I ^{was} also bound to accept the whole patriarchal system of ethics. It is difficult now to recall how completely I believed in the natural supremacy of male over female. I never heard it even questioned until I met Nancy, when I was about twenty-two, towards the end of the war. The surprising sense of ease that I got from her frank statement of equality between the sexes ~~and how I had to be impressed by her~~ ~~was~~ ^{among my chief} reasons for ~~liking~~ liking her. My mother had always taken the "love honour and obey" contract literally; my sisters were brought up to wish themselves boys, to be shocked at the idea of woman's suffrage and not to expect as expensive an education as their brothers. The final decision in any domestic matter always rested with my father. ^{would say} My mother ~~said~~ "If two ride together one must ride behind." Nancy ^{'s crude summary} ~~said~~ ~~"If two ride together one~~

~~"God is a man, so it must be all rot."~~
~~took a load off my shoulders.~~

We children did not talk German well; our genders and minor parts of speech were shaky and we never learned to read Gothic characters or script. Yet we had the feel of German so strongly that I would say now that I knew German far better than French, though I can read French almost as fast as I can read English, and could only read a German book very painfully and slowly with the help of a dictionary. I use different parts of my mind for the two languages. French ^{was} ~~was~~ a surface acquirement and I could forget it quite easily if I had no reason to use it every now and then.

CHAPTER V.

I spent a good part of my early life at Wimbledon. My mother and father did not get rid of the house, a big one near the Common, until some time about the end of the war; yet of all the time I spent in it I can recall little or nothing of significance. But after the age of eleven or twelve I was away at school and in the spring and summer holidays we were all in the country so that I was only at Wimbledon in the Christmas holidays and for a day or two at the beginning and end of the other holidays. London was only a half-hour away and yet we seldom went there. My mother and father never took us to the theatre, not even to pantomimes, and until the middle of the war I had only been to the theatre twice in my life and then only to childrens' plays, taken by an aunt. My mother wished to bring us up to be serious and to benefit humanity in some practical way. She allowed us no hint of ~~the~~ dirtiness and intrigue and lustfulness ~~of the~~, believing ^{that} ~~the~~ innocence ^{was the surest protection against them.} ~~that~~ Our reading was carefully censored by her. I was destined to be "if not a great man at least a good man." Our treats were educational or aesthetic, to Kew Gardens, Hampton Court, the Zoo, the British Museum ^{or} ~~the~~ the Natural History Museum.

I remember my mother ~~in~~ the treasure room at the British Museum, ~~telling~~ ^{all} telling us with shining eyes that these treasures were ours. We looked at her astonished. She said, "Yes, they belong to us as members of the public. We can look at them, admire them, and study them for as long as we like. If we had them back at home we couldn't do more." ~~that~~ ~~she~~ ~~could~~ ~~prevent~~ ~~anybody~~ ~~else~~ ~~looking~~ ~~at~~ ~~them~~

We read more books than most children do. There must have been four or five thousand books in the house. They consisted of an old-fashioned scholar's library bequeathed to my father by my lexicographical namesake whom I have mentioned as the friend of Wordsworth, but who had a more tender friendship with Felicia Hemans; to this was added

~~the~~ ~~books~~ ~~of~~ ~~my~~ ~~father's~~ ~~own~~ ~~collection~~ ~~of~~ ~~books~~, mostly poetry, with a particular cupboard for Anglo-Irish literature; Devotional works contributed by my mother; educational books sent to my father by the publishers in the hope that he would recommend them for use in Government schools; and novels and adventure books brought into the house by my elder brothers and sisters.

My mother used to tell us stories about ~~great~~ inventors and doctors who ^{gave their lives for the suffering} ~~and~~ ~~poor~~ boys who ~~struggled~~ to the top of the tree, and saintly men who ~~made~~ ^{examples of themselves.} ~~examples of themselves.~~

There was ^{also the} ~~was~~ parable of the king who had a very beautiful garden which ~~was~~ ^{was} thrown ~~open~~ to the public. ~~Two~~ ^{Two} students entered; and one, who was the person of whom my mother spoke with a slight sneer in her voice, noticed occasional weeds even in the tulip-beds, but the other, and there she brightened up, found beautiful flowers growing even on rubbish heaps.

^{as much as possible} ~~She~~ ^{she} kept off the subject of war; ~~she~~ ^{she} always had difficulty in ~~explaining~~ ^{explaining to us} how it was that God permitted wars. The Boer War clouded my early childhood; ^{Philip, my elder brother} ~~Philip, my elder brother~~ ^{also} ~~also~~ ^{also} called himself a Fenian) was ~~a~~ ^a pro-Boer and there was great tension at the breakfast table between him and my father whose political views were always orthodox.

~~The~~ ^{the} sale of ~~the~~ ^{the} Wimbledon house ~~solved~~ ^{solved} a good many problems; it was getting too full. ~~It~~ ^{It} was only to solve the ~~problem~~ ^{problem} of the ~~cupboard~~ ^{cupboard}. My mother hated away anything that could possibly in the most contingency be of any service to anyone. ~~The~~ ^{The} cupboard was perhaps the most significant ~~feature~~ ^{feature} at house. Nobody could say that it was untidy, except the all the bottles had stoppers ~~but~~ ^{but} they were ~~but~~ ^{but} crowded together that it was impossible for anybody except my mother, who had a long memory, to know what was at back. Every few years, no doubt, she went through this cupboard. ~~I~~ ^I think she ~~thought~~ ^{thought} ~~nothing~~ ^{nothing} ~~at~~ ^{at} all. If there was any doubtful bottle she would tentatively re-label it. ~~"This must be Alfred's~~ ^{old} ~~union salve"~~ ^{union salve"} and another, "Strychnine - Query?" Even special medicines prescribed level of the folk-song or the simple religious hymn.

Beyond this simple level no other can be reached is only because German is not that sort of language. All the rest is literary display or philosophy or sociology or sob-stuff.
I don't mean that Germans are peculiar in this limitation;
there are probably not more than three languages in which it is possible to write poetry of a higher level; English is one, Demotic Greek is another, and I am told that Chinese is the third. Anyhow, the German human beings are usually very good human beings and if that were enough I would be content to be a German.

for scarlet-fever or whooping-cough were kept, [redacted] in case of re-infection.

[redacted]
She was always an energetic labeller.
[redacted]

[redacted] of them. She wrote in one of my school prizes:-
"Robert Ranke Graves won this book as a prize for being first in his class in the term's work and second in examinations. He also won a special prize for divinity, though the youngest boy in the class. Written by his affectionate mother, Amy Graves. Summer, 1908." Home made jam used always to arrive at the table well labelled; one small pot ^(now: An) [redacted] "gooseberry, [redacted] lemon and [redacted] a little shop [redacted] added - Nelly re-boiled." [redacted] [redacted] as possible.

In a recent book, Mrs. Fisher, I moralised on three sayings and a favourite story of my mother's. I ascribed them there for the argument's sake to my Danish grandmother.

[redacted]
good in [redacted]. They were these:

Children, I command you, as your mother, never to swing objects around in your hands. The King of Hanover put out his eye by swinging a bead purse.

Children, I command you, as your mother, to be careful when you carry your candles up to bed. The candle is a little cup of grease.

There was a man once, a Frenchman, who died of grief because he could never become a mother.

And the story told in candle-light:-

*There was once a peasant family living in Schleswig-Holstein, where they all have crooked mouths, and one night they wished to blow out the candle. The father's mouth was twisted to the left, so! - and he tried to blow out the candle, so! - but he was too

"proud to stand anywhere but directly before the candle, and he puffed and he puffed but could not blow the candle out. And then the mother tried, but her mouth was twisted to the right so! - and she tried to blow so! - and she was too proud to stand anywhere but directly before the candle, and she puffed and puffed but could not blow the candle out. Then there was the brother with mouth twisted outward, so! - and the sister with the mouth twisted downward, so! - and they tried each in their turn, so! - and so! - and the idiot baby with his mouth twisted in an eternal grin tried so! And at last the maid, a beautiful girl from Copenhagen with a perfectly formed mouth, put it out with her shoe. So! Flap!"

These quotations make it clear how much more I owe to my mother than to my father, as a writer. She also taught me to speak the truth and shame the Devil? Her favourite Biblical exhortation was "My son, shakou thy head proud to do, so it with all thy might."

I always felt that Wimbledon was a wrong place, neither town nor country. It was at its worst on Wednesdays, my mother's At Home day. Tea was in the drawing-room. We used to be called in in our Sunday clothes to eat cakes and be polite. My sisters were made to recite. Around Christmas, celebrated in the German style, came a dozen or so childrens' parties; we used to make ourselves sick with excitement. I do not like thinking of Wimbledon. But every spring and summer after my third year, unless we happened to go to Germany, or to France as we did once, we went to Harlech in North Wales. My mother had built a house there.

In the days before motor traffic began around the North Welsh coast Harlech was a very quiet place and little known even as a golf centre. It was in three parts. First, the village itself; five hundred feet up on a steep range of hills; it had granite houses with slate roofs and ugly windows and gables, chapels of seven or eight different denominations and enough shops to make it the shopping centre for the smaller villages around, and the Castle, a favourite playground of ours. Then there was the Morfa, a flat plain from which the sea had receded; part of this was the golf links, but ~~to the north~~ was a stretch of wild country which we used to visit ~~in the~~ in the spring in search of plovers' eggs. The sea was beyond the links, good hard sand stretching for miles, safe bathing and sandhills for hide and seek.

The third part of Harlech which became the most important to us was never visited by golfers or the few other summer visitors or by the village people themselves: this was the desolate rocky hill-country at the back of the village. As we grew older we spent more and more of our time up there and less and less on the beach or on the links which were the most obvious attractions of the place. There were occasional farms or rather crofts in these hills but one could easily walk fifteen or twenty miles without crossing a road or passing close to a farm. Originally we went up there with some practical excuse. For the blueberries on the hills near Maesygarnedd; or for the cranberries at ~~Maesygarnedd~~ ^{Gwllwyn}; or to find bits of Roman hypocaust tiling (with the potter's thumb-marks still on them) in the ruined Roman villas by Castell Tomenymur; or for globe-flowers in the upper ~~Arto~~ ^{Arto}; or to catch a sight of the wild goats that lived at the back of Rhinog Fawr, the biggest of the hills of the next range; or to get raspberries from the thickets near Cwmbychan Lake; or to find white heather on a hill that we didn't know the name of away to the north of the Roman Steps. But after a time we walked about those hills simply because they were good to walk about on. They had a penny plain quality about them that was even better than the twopence coloured quality of the Bavarian Alps. My best friend at the time was my sister Rosaleen, who was one year older than myself.

I suppose what I liked about this country (and I know no country like it) was its independence of formal nature. The passage of the seasons was hardly noticed there; the wind always seemed to be blowing and the grass always seemed to be withered and the small streams were always cold and clear, running over black stones. Sheep were the only animals about, but they were ^{not} nature, except in the lambing season; they were too close to the granite boulders covered with grey lichen that lay about everywhere. There were few trees except a few nut-bushes, ^{rowans,} stunted oaks and thorn-bushes in the valleys. The winters were always mild, so that last year's bracken and last year's heather lasted in a faded way through to the next spring. There were ^{almost} no birds except an occasional buzzard, ^{and curlews crying in the distance,} and wherever we went we felt that the rocky skeleton of the hill was only an inch or two under the turf. Once when I came home on leave from the war I spent about a week of my ten days walking about on these hills to restore my sanity. I tried to do the same after I was wounded, but by that time the immediate horror of death was too strong for the ~~indifference~~ ^{indifference} of the hills to relieve it.

I am glad that it was Wales and not Ireland. We never went to Ireland, except once when I was an infant in arms. We had no Welsh blood in us and did not like the Harlech villagers much. We had no temptation to learn Welsh or to pretend ourselves Welsh. We knew that country as a quite ungeographical region; any stray sheep-farmers that we met who belonged to the place we resented somehow as intruders ^{on our privacy}

Clarissa, Rosaleen and I were once out on the remotest hills and had not seen a soul all day. At last we came to a waterfall and two trout lying on the bank beside it; ten yards away was the fisherman. He was disentangling his line from a thornbush and had not seen us. So we crept up quietly to the fish and put a sprig of whitebell-heather (which we had found that afternoon) in the mouth of each. We hurried back to cover, and I said: "Shall we watch?" but Clarissa said: "No, don't spoil it." So we came home and never spoke of it again even to each other: and never knew the sequel.

~~on our privacy.~~ If it had been Ireland we would have ~~known~~ ^{self-consciously learned} ~~about~~ Irish and the local legends. Instead we came to know the country more purely, as a place whose ~~history~~ ^{was too old for local legends} ~~was too old~~; when we were ^{up} walking there we made our own legends. We decided who was buried under the Standing Stone and who had lived in the ruined round-hut encampment. On our visits to Germany I had felt a sense of home in my blood in a natural human way, but on the hills behind Harlech I found a personal harmony independent of history or geography. ~~There were more than~~

~~known to me.~~ ~~of what~~
~~was~~ (The first poem that I wrote as a Graves was ~~typical~~ a free translation of a satire by Catullus.)
The first poem I wrote as myself concerned that hill-country.
~~was~~

My father was always too busy and absent-minded to worry much about us children; my mother did worry. Yet she allowed us to go off immediately after breakfast into the hills and did not complain much when we came back long after supper-time. Though she had a terror of heights herself she never restrained us from climbing about in dangerous places; so we never got hurt. I had a bad head for heights and trained myself ~~deliberately and painfully~~ to overcome it. We used to go climbing in the turrets and towers of Harlech Castle. ~~Myself~~ ^{(I have worked hard on} ~~myself~~ in defining and dispersing terrors. The simple fear of heights was ~~the~~ the most obvious to get rid of. There was a quarry-face in the garden of our Harlech house.

It provided one or two easy climbs, but gradually I invented more and more difficult ones for myself. After each new success I had to lie down, shaking with nervousness, in the safe meadow grass at the top. Once I lost my foothold on a ledge and ~~should~~ have been killed; but ~~_____~~ it ~~_____~~ seemed as though I improvised a foothold in the air and kicked myself up to safety from it. When I examined the place afterwards it was almost as if the Devil had given me what he had offered Christ in the Temptation, the freedom to cast myself down from the rock and be restored to safety by the angels. Yet such events are not uncommon in mountain climbing. George Mallory, for instance, ~~_____~~ ~~_____~~ did an inexplicable climb on Snowdon once. He had left his pipe on a ledge half way down one of the precipices and scrambled back by a short cut to retrieve it, then up again by the same way. No one saw just how he did the climb but when they came to examine it the next day for official record, they found that it was an impossible overhang nearly all the way. The rule of the Climbers' Club was that no climbs should be called after their inventors, but after natural features. An exception was made in this case; the climb was recorded something like this: "Mallory's Pipe, a variation on Route 2; see adjoining map. This climb is totally impossible. It has been performed once, in failing light, by Mr. G. H. L. Mallory."

CHAPTER VI.

About Charterhouse. Let me begin by recalling my feelings on the day that I left, about a week before the outbreak of war. I discussed them with a friend who felt as I did. ~~First we were~~ ^{First we saw} ~~convinced~~ ^{perhaps} that there were ~~Public Schools~~ ^{even more typical} ~~more~~ than Charterhouse at the time but that ~~this~~ was difficult to believe. Next that there was no possible remedy, because tradition was ^{if one wished to break it} so strong that ~~one would~~ have to dismiss the whole school ^{and staff} and start ^{all over} again ~~with~~ ~~the~~ ~~same~~ ~~staff~~ ~~and~~ ~~buildings~~. But that even would not be enough, for the school buildings were ~~so~~ ^{what was called the Public School spirit but what we felt as} impregnated with ~~the~~ ~~same~~ ~~fundamental~~ ~~badness~~ that ~~the~~ ~~same~~ ~~buildings~~ ^{they} would have to be demolished and ^{the school} rebuilt elsewhere and ^{its} name ~~of~~ ~~the~~ ~~school~~ changed. Next that our only regret at leaving the place was that for the last year we had been in a position as members of Sixth Form to do more or less what we pleased ~~in~~ ~~the~~ ~~school~~.

Now we were both going on to St. John's College, Oxford, which seemed by reputation to be merely a more boisterous repetition of Charterhouse. ~~We~~ ^W would be freshmen there and ~~we~~ would naturally refuse to be hearty and Public-School-ish and there would be all the stupidity of having our rooms raided and being forced to lose our temper and hurt somebody and be hurt ourselves. And ~~there~~ there would be no peace probably until we got into our third year when we would be back again in the same sort of position as ~~we~~ now, and in the same sort of position as ~~we~~ ~~had~~ ~~been~~ ~~in~~ at our preparatory school in our last year. "In 1917," said Nevill, "the official seal will be put on all this dreariness. We'll get our degrees, and then we'll have to start as new boys again in some dreary profession." "My God," he said, turning to me suddenly, "I can't stand the idea of it. I must put something in between me and Oxford. I must at least go abroad for the whole vacation." I didn't feel that three months was long enough. I had a vague intention of running away to sea. "Do you realise" he said to me, "that we have spent fourteen years of our life principally at Latin and Greek, not even competently taught, and that we are going to start another three years of the same thing?" But, when we had said our very worst of Charterhouse, I said to him or he said to me, I forget which, "Of course, the trouble is that in the school at any given time there are always at least two ^{really} decent masters among the forty or fifty and ten ^{really} decent fellows among the five or six hundred. We will ~~never~~ remember them and have Lot's feeling about not damning Sodom, for the sake of ten just persons. And in another twenty years' time we'll forget this conversation and think that we were mistaken and that perhaps everybody, with a few criminal exceptions, was fairly average decent and we'll say 'I was a young fool then, insisting on impossible perfection' and we'll send our sons to Charterhouse sentimentally, and they'll go through all we did."

49

I do not wish this to be construed as an attack on my old school but merely as a record of my feelings at the time. No doubt I was unappreciative of the hard knocks and character-training that public schools are supposed to provide, and as ^{a typical} ~~an~~ Old Carthusian remarked to me recently, "The whole moral tone of the school has improved out of all recognition since those days."

As a matter of fact I did not go up to Oxford until five years later ^{in 1919,} when my brother, four years younger than myself, was already in residence, and I did not take my degree until 1926, at the same time as ^{the} ~~the~~ brother ^{he} who was eight years younger than myself. Oxford was extraordinarily kind to me. I did no Latin or Greek there, though I had a Classical Scholarship. I did not sit for a single examination. I never had rooms at St. John's though I used to go there to draw a Government grant for tuition fees. I lived outside the University three mile radius. For my last ^{five years} ~~under~~ undergraduate years I did ^{not} ~~not~~ even have a tutor. ~~My~~

~~_____~~
~~_____~~

[redacted] I have a warm feeling for [redacted]

[redacted] of Oxford. [redacted]

Its rules and statutes though apparently cast-iron [redacted]

are ready

[redacted] for emergencies. [redacted]

In my case at any rate a poet was an emergency.

I [redacted] at Oxford would not have

[redacted]

Whenever I come to the word "Charterhouse" in this story I find myself escaping into digressions but I suppose ^{that} I must get through with it. From the moment I arrived at the school I suffered an oppression of spirit that [redacted] ^{I hesitate now} to recall ^{it} in its full intensity. It ^{was} something like being in that chilly cellar at Laufzorn among the potatoes, but being a potato out of a different bag from the rest. The school consisted of about six hundred boys. The chief interests were games and ^{romantic friendships} [redacted]. School-work was despised by everyone; the scholars, of whom there were about fifty in the school at any given time, were not concentrated in a single dormitory-house as at Winchester but divided among ^{ten} [redacted]. They were known as "pro's" and unless they were good at games and willing to pretend that they hated work as much or more than the non-scholars and ready whenever called on to help them with their work, they ^{usually} had a bad time.

I was a scholar and ~~I~~ really liked work and I was surprised and disappointed at the apathy of the class-rooms. My first term I was left alone more or less, it being a school convention that new boys should be neither encouraged nor baited. ~~The other boys seldom~~ ^{The other boys seldom} spoke ~~to~~ ^{to} ~~to~~ ^{to} inform them of ~~some~~ ^{them except to send them on errands or} breaches of school convention. But my second term my trouble began. There were a number of things ~~that~~ that naturally made for ^{my} unpopularity. Besides being a scholar and not outstandingly good at games, I was always short of pocket-money. I could not conform to the social custom of treating my contemporaries to food at the school shop, and because I could not treat them I could not accept their treating. My clothes were all wrong; they conformed outwardly to the school pattern but they were ready-made and not of the best-quality cloth that the other boys all wore. Even so I had not been taught how to make the best of them. Neither my mother nor my father ~~had~~ ^{had} any regard for the niceties of ^{modern} dress and my elder brothers were abroad by this time. The other boys in my house, except ~~the~~ ^{for five} scholars, were nearly all the sons of business men; it was a class of whose ^{interests and} prejudices I knew nothing, ~~having~~ ^{having} hitherto only met ^{boys of} the professional class. ^{And I talked too much for their liking.} A further disability was that I was as prudishly innocent as my mother had planned I should be. I knew nothing about simple sex, let alone the many refinements of sex constantly referred to in school ⁱⁿ conversation. My immediate reaction was one of disgust; I wanted to run away.

The ~~worst~~ ^{most unfortunate} disability of all was that my initials appeared on the school list as "R. von R. Graves." I had only known hitherto that my second name was Ranke, the "von" ^{discovered on my birth-certificate} was disconcerting. Carthusians were always secretive about their second names; if these were fancy ones they usually managed to conceal them. Ranke, without the "von" I could no doubt have passed off as ^{monosyllabic and} English but "von Ranke" was glaring. ~~_____~~

~~_____~~ The business-class to which most of the ^{boys} ~~school~~ belonged ^{was} strongly ^{feeling at this time the threat and even} ~~_____~~ the necessity of a trade war; ~~the~~ "German" meant "Dirty German". It meant "cheap shoddy goods competing with our sterling industries" and it also meant military menace, Prussianism, sabre-rattling, ~~_____~~ ~~_____~~. There was another boy in my house with a German name, but English by birth and upbringing. He was treated much as I was. On the other hand a French boy in the house was very popular, though he was not much good at ^{games} anything. King Edward VII had done his ^{entire} work very thoroughly.
There was also considerable anti-Jewish feeling (the business prejudice again) and ~~_____~~ the legend was put about that I was not only a German but a German-Jew. ~~_____~~
~~_____~~

Of course I always maintained that I was Irish. This claim was resented by an Irish boy who had been in the house about a year and a half longer than myself. He went out of his way to ^{hurt} me ~~_____~~ not only by physical acts of spite like throwing ink over my school-books, hiding my games-clothes, setting on me suddenly from behind corners, pouring water over me at night, but by continually forcing his bawdy humour on my prudishness and inviting everybody to laugh at my disgust; he also built up a sort of humorous legend of my hypocrisy and concealed depravity.
I came near a nervous breakdown. School morality prevented me from informing the house-master of my troubles. The house-monitors were supposed to keep order and preserve the moral tone of the house, but at this time they were not the sort ~~_____~~ to interfere in any case of bullying among the juniors. I tried violent resistance but as the odds were always heavily against me that ^{the} merely encouraged the ragging. Complete passive resistance would probably have been better. I only got accustomed to bawdy-talk in my last two years at Charterhouse and it was not until I had been some time in the Army that I got hardened to it and could reply in kind to insults.

The then headmaster of Charterhouse ^{, an innocent man,} is reported to have said ~~innocently~~ at a Headmasters' Conference: "My boys are amorous but seldom erotic." Few cases of eroticism ~~indeed~~ ^{indeed} ever came to his notice; there were not more than five or six big rows all the time I was at Charterhouse and expulsions were rare. But the housemasters knew little about what went on in their houses; their ^{living} quarters were removed from the boys'. There was a true distinction between ~~the~~ 'amorousness,' by which the headmaster meant a sentimental falling in love with younger boys, and ~~the~~ eroticism, which was adolescent lust. ~~The~~ ^{The} intimacy, as the newspapers call it, that frequently took place was practically never between an elder boy and the object of his ~~affection~~ ^{affection}, ^{for that would have spoilt the romantic illusion, which was hetero-sexually cast. It was} but between boys of the same age who were not in love ~~with~~ ^{but used} each other ^{coldly as convenient} ~~sex-instruments.~~ ^{sex-instruments.} ~~So the~~ So the atmosphere was always heavy with romance of a very conventional early-Victorian type, yet complicated by cynicism and foulness.

CHAPTER VII.

Halfway through my second year I wrote to my parents to tell them that I must leave Charterhouse because I could not stand life there any longer. I told them that the house was making it ~~so~~ plain ~~possible~~ that I did not belong and that it did not want me. I gave them details, in confidence, to make them take my demand seriously. They were unable to respect this confidence, considering that it was their religious duty to inform the house-master of all I had written them. They did not even tell me what they were doing; they contented themselves with visiting me and giving me assurances of the power of prayer and faith; telling me that I must endure all for the sake of ... I have forgotten what, exactly. Fortunately I had not given them any account of sex-irregularities in the house, so all that the house-master did was to make a speech that night after prayers deterrent of bullying in general; he told us that he had just had a complaint from a boy's parents. He made it plain at the same time how much he disliked informers and outside interference in affairs of the house. My name was not mentioned, but the visit of my parents on a day not a holiday had been noticed and commented on. So I had to stay on and be treated as an informer. I was now in the upper school and so had a study of my own. But this was no security; studies had no locks. It was always being wrecked. After my parents' visit to the house-master ^{it} was not even ^{possible for me} ~~possible~~ to use the ordinary house changing-room; I had to remove my games-clothes to a disused shower-bath. My heart went wrong then; the school-doctor said I was not to play football. This was low water for me. My last resource was to sham insanity. It succeeded. ^{Soon} ~~they~~ troubled about me ~~but~~ except to avoid ^{contact with} ~~me~~ ^{me.}

Being thrown entirely on myself I began to write poetry.

I must make clear that I am not charging my parents with treachery; they were trying to help me. Their honour is beyond reproach..... One day I went down to Charterhouse by the special train from Waterloo to Godalming. I was too late to take a ticket; I just got into a compartment ^{before the train started} ~~in the~~. The railway company had not provided enough coaches so I had to stand up all the way. At Godalming Station the crowd of boys rushing out into the Station-Yard to secure taxis swept me past the ticket collectors, so I had got my very uncomfortable ride free. I mentioned this in my next letter home, just for something to say, and my father sent me a letter of reproach. He said that he had himself made a special visit to Waterloo Station, bought a ticket to Godalming and torn it up.... My mother was even more scrupulous. A young couple on their honeymoon once happened to stop the night with us at Wimbledon and left behind them a packet of sandwiches, some of which had already been eaten. My mother sent them on.

- 55 to 58

Being thrown entirely on myself I began to write poetry. This was considered stronger proof of insanity than the formal straws I wore in my hair. The poetry I wrote was not ~~the poetry of complaint or despondency, nor was it~~ the easy showing-off witty stuff that all the Graves write and have written for the last couple of centuries. ~~The vocabulary and form were stilted but it had that quality of aliveness which~~ It was poetry that was dissatisfied with itself. ~~is to me now the most important definable quality of poetry.~~ ~~... this one ...~~ ~~... what it was that King David scribbled on the prison wall when he resigned ...~~ Later when ~~... things went better with me at Charterhouse, I became literary once more.~~

I sent one of ~~my~~ my poems ~~written in my loneliness~~ to the school magazine, the Carthusian. On the strength of it I was invited to join the school Poetry Society. This was a most anomalous organisation for Charterhouse. It consisted of seven members. ~~and~~ The meetings, for the reading and discussion of poetry, were held once a month at the house of Guy Kendall, then a form-master at the school, now headmaster of University College School at Hampstead. The members were four sixth-form boys and two boys a year and a half older than myself, one of whom was ^{called} Raymond Rodakowski. None of them were in the same house as myself. At Charterhouse no friendship was permitted between boys of different houses or of different years beyond a formal acquaintance at work or organised games like cricket and football. It was, for instance, impossible for boys of different houses, though related or next-door neighbours at home, even to play a friendly game of tennis or squash racquets together. They would never ^{have} ~~heard~~ the last of it. So the friendship that began between me and Raymond was most unconventional. Coming home one evening from a meeting of the society I told Raymond about life in the house; I told him what had happened a week or two before. My study had been raided and one of my ~~poems~~ ^{more} ~~personal~~ had been discovered and pinned up on the public notice board in 'Writing School.'. This was the living-room of the members of the lower-school, into which as a member of the upper-school I was not allowed to go, ~~and so could not see it~~ Raymond was the first person I had been able to talk to humanly. He was indignant, and took my arm in his in the gentlest way.

"They are bloody barbarians," he said. Raymond's mother was Scottish, his father was an Austrian Pole. He told me that I must pull myself together and do something about it, because I was a good poet, he said, and a good person. I loved him for that. ~~He~~ He said "You're not allowed to play football; why don't you box? It's supposed to be good for the heart." So I laughed and said I would. Then Raymond said "I expect they rag you about your initials." "Yes," I said, "they call me a dirty German." "I had trouble too," he said, "before I took up boxing." ↗

Very few ~~boys~~ ^{boys} at Charterhouse boxed and the boxing-room, which was over the school confectionery-shop, was a good place to meet Raymond whom otherwise I would not have been able to see often. I began boxing ~~seriously~~ seriously and savagely. Raymond said to me, "You know these cricketers and footballers are all afraid of boxers, almost superstitious. They won't box themselves for fear of losing their good looks ~~the~~ the inter-house competitions every year are such bloody affairs. Do you remember the Mansfield, Waller and Taylor show? That's a good tradition to keep up."

Of course I remembered. Two terms previously there had been a meeting of the school debating society which I had attended. The committee of the debating society was usually made up of sixth form boys; the debates were formal and usually dull, but in so far as there was any intellectual life at Charterhouse it was represented by the debating society ^{— and} ~~and~~ by the Carthusian, always edited by two members of this committee; both institutions were free from influence of the masters. (One debate night) Debates were always held in the school library on Saturday night. ~~the~~ usual decorous conventions were broken by an invasion of "the bloods." The bloods were the members of the cricket and football elevens. They were the ruling caste at Charterhouse; the eleventh man in the football eleven though a member of the Under ^{form} IVth had a great deal more prestige than the most brilliant classical scholar in the sixth ~~form~~. Even "Head of the School" was an empty title. There was not however an open warfare between the sixth form intellectuals and the bloods. The bloods were stupid and knew it and had nothing to gain by a clash; the intellectuals were happy to be left alone. So this invasion of the bloods, who had just returned from winning a match against the Casuals and had probably been drinking, caused the debating society a good deal of embarrassment. The bloods disturbed the meeting by cheers and cat-cries and slamming the library magazine-folders on the table. Mansfield, as president of the society, called them to order but they continued the disturbance; so Mansfield closed the debate. The bloods thought the incident finished, but it was not. A letter appeared in the ~~Carthusian~~ Carthusian a few days later protesting against the bad behaviour in the debating society of "certain First Eleven babies." Three sets of initials were signed and they were those of Mansfield, Waller and Taylor. The school was astonished by this suicidally daring act; it waited for Korah, Dathan and Abiram to be swallowed up.

~~the First Eleven~~ The captain of football is said to have sworn that he'd chuck the three signatories into the fountain in Founder's Court; but somehow he did not. The fact was that this happened early in the autumn term and there were only two other First Eleven colours left over from the preceding year; new colours were only given gradually as the football season advanced. The other rowdies had only been embryo bloods. So it was a matter entirely between these three sixth-form intellectuals and the three colours of the First Eleven. And ~~the First Eleven were~~ ^{the First Eleven were} uncomfortably aware that Mansfield was the heavyweight boxing champion of the school, Taylor the runner-up for the middle-weights, and ^(the tough fellow, though not, perhaps a boxer - I forget) that Waller was also ~~known~~ a person to be reckoned with. While the First Eleven were wondering what on earth to do their three opponents decided to take the war into the enemy's country.

The social code of Charterhouse was based on a very strict caste system; the caste-marks were slight distinctions in dress. A new boy had no privileges at all; a boy in his second term might wear a knitted tie instead of a plain one; a boy in his second year might wear coloured socks; third year gave most of the privileges - turned down collars, coloured handkerchiefs, a coat with a long roll, and so on; fourth year, a few more, such as the right to get up raffles; but very peculiar and unique distinctions were reserved for the bloods. These included light grey flannel trousers, butterfly collars, ^{and} the privilege of walking arm-in-arm, ~~and~~ coats slit up the back. So the next Sunday Mansfield, Waller and Taylor did the bravest thing that was ever done at Charterhouse. The school chapel-service was at eleven in the morning, but the custom was for the school to be in its seats by five minutes to eleven and to sit waiting there. At two minutes to eleven the bloods used to stalk in; at one and a half minutes to ~~came~~ came the masters; at one minute to came the choir in its surplices; then the headmaster arrived and the service started. If any boy was accidentally late and sneaked in between five minutes to and two minutes to the hour, he was followed by six hundred pairs of eyes; there was nudging and giggling and he would not hear the last of it for a long time; it was as though he were pretending to be a blood. ~~The three sixth-formers realised this.~~ On this Sunday ^{then,} when the bloods had come in with their usual swaggering assurance, an extraordinary thing happened.

The three sixth-formers ^{slowly walked} ~~walked~~ (magnificent) up the aisle ~~in~~ in grey flannel trousers, slit coats, First Eleven collars and with pink carnations in their buttonholes. It is impossible to describe the astonishment ^{and} terror ~~and~~ ~~hysteria~~ that this spectacle caused. Everyone looked at the Captain of the First Eleven; he had gone quite white. But by this time the masters had come in, followed by the choir, and the opening hymn, though raggedly sung, ended the tension. When chapel emptied it always emptied according to "school-order," that is, according to position in work; the sixth-form went out first. The bloods were not high in school-order, so Mansfield, Waller and Taylor had the start of them. After chapel on Sunday the custom in the winter terms was for people to meet and gossip in the school library; so it was here that Mansfield, Waller and Taylor went. They had buttonholed a talkative master and drawn him with them into the library, and there they kept him talking until dinner time. If the bloods had had courage to do anything desperate they would have had to do it at once, but they could not make a scene in the presence of a master. Mansfield, Waller and Taylor went down to their houses for dinner still talking to the master. After this they kept together as much as possible and the school, particularly the lower school which had always chafed ~~at~~ under the dress regulations, made heroes of them and began scoffing at the bloods as weak-kneed.

Finally the captain of the Eleven was stupid enough to complain to the headmaster about this breach of school conventions, asking for permission to enforce first eleven rights by disciplinary measures. The headmaster, who was a scholar and disliked the games tradition, refused his request. He said that the sixth form deserved as distinctive privileges as the first eleven. The sixth-form would therefore in future be entitled to hold what they had assumed. After this the prestige of the bloods declined greatly.

At Raymond's encouragement
I pulled myself together and my third year found things very much easier for me. My chief persecutor, the Irishman, had left. He had had a nervous breakdown, due, it was said, to continual self-abuse. He wrote me a hysterical letter demanding my forgiveness for his treatment of me, saying at the same time that if I did not give this forgiveness one of his friends (whom he mentioned) ~~was~~ was still in the house ~~would continue~~ to persecute me. I did not answer the letter. I ^{do not} ~~don't~~ know what happened to him. The friend never bothered.

CHAPTER VIII.

I still had no friends ^{except among} ~~but I had~~ ~~the~~ the junior members of the house ^(to whom) ~~because I used to~~ ~~did not~~ did not disguise my dislike of ~~the~~ ^{the} ~~seniors~~ ^{seniors}; it happened that the juniors were on the ~~whole a~~ ^{decent} lot ^{of fellows}. Towards the end of this year in the ~~annual boxing and gymnastic display I~~ ^{fought} three ~~rounds~~
~~with Raymond.~~ ~~He fought very hard,~~

~~There is a lot of sex-feeling in boxing - the dual play, the reciprocity, the~~
~~It has the play element of sex, the excitement of~~ ~~pain is not felt as pain. This exhibition~~
~~match to me had something of the quality that Dr. Marie~~ ~~Stopes would call sacramental. We were (neither out) to hurt~~ ~~nor~~ win ~~though~~ we ~~hit~~ hit each other hard.
~~as we put it to ourselves, I was not light of~~ ^{improved}

~~This public appearance as a boxer~~ ^{made} my position ^{in the house} ~~in the house~~. ^{And} I was now allowed to play football again and played it fairly well. Then things started going wrong in a different way. It began with Confirmation for which I was prepared by a zealous evangelical master. For a whole term I concentrated all my thoughts on religion ^(, looking forward to the Ceremony as a spiritual) climax.
~~When it came, &~~ ~~the~~
~~did not~~ Holy Ghost ^{& I did not} descend in the form of a dove, ~~find myself~~ ~~gifted with tongues,~~ ~~nothing~~
^{spectacular} ~~such~~ ^(except that the boy whom the Bishop of Zululand was blessing at the same time as myself slipped off the narrow footstool on which we were both kneeling) happened, I was bound to feel ^{a reaction.}

~~Raymond~~ Raymond had not been confirmed and I was astonished to hear him admit and even boast that he was an atheist. I argued with him ^{about} ~~the~~ the existence of God and the divinity of Christ and the necessity of the Trinity ~~and the rest of it~~. He said, of the Trinity, that anybody who could agree with the Athenasian Creed that "Whoever will be saved must confess that there are not Three Incomprehensibles but One Incomprehensible" was saying that a man must go to Hell if he does ^{not} believe something that is by definition impossible to understand. He said that ~~his respect for himself as a reasonable~~ ^{his respect for himself as a reasonable} ~~being that~~ ^{did} ~~not allow him to believe such things -~~ ^{not allow him to believe such things -} He also asked me a question, "What's the good of having a soul if you have a mind. What's the function of the soul? It seems a mere pawn in the game." I was shocked but because I loved him and respected him I felt bound to find ^{an} ~~an~~ answer. ~~all this~~ The more I thought about it the less certain I became that he was wrong. So in order not to prejudice religion (and I put religion and my chances of salvation before human love) I at first broke my friendship with Raymond entirely. Later I weakened but he would not even meet me, when I approached him, with any broad-church compromise. He was a complete and ruthless atheist and I could not appreciate his ^{of spirit} fineness. So for the rest of our time at Charterhouse we were not as close as we should have been. I met Raymond in France in 1916, when he was with the Irish Guards; I rode over to see him one afternoon and felt as close to him as I had ever felt. He was killed at Cambrai not long after.

My feeling for Raymond was more comradely than amorous. ~~In~~ ^{an even stronger} In my fourth year ~~another~~ relationship started ~~which was one of the most important in my life~~

It was with a boy three years younger than myself who was ^{because his name was George & I do not want him confused with George Mallory -} exceptionally intelligent and fine spirited. Call him Dick, ^h He was in another house but I had recently joined the school choir and so had he, and I had opportunities for speaking to him occasionally after choir-practice. I was unconscious of ~~sexual~~ ^{Our} ~~feeling~~ for him, ~~conversation~~ ^{were always} ~~impersonal~~. Our acquaintance was commented on and I was warned by one of the masters to end it. I replied that I would not have my friendships in any way limited. I pointed out that this boy was interested in the same things as myself, particularly in ~~books~~ ^{books}; that the disparity in our ages was unfortunate, but that a lack of intelligence among the boys of my own age made it necessary for me to find friends where I could. Finally the headmaster took me to task about it. I lectured him on the ~~advantage~~ ^{advantage} of friendship between elder and younger boys ~~citing~~ ^{citing} Plato, ~~the~~ the Greek poets, ~~Shakespeare, Michael Angelo and others~~ ^{who} had felt the same way as I did. ~~I~~ ^{He} let me go without taking any action.

In my fifth year I was in the sixth form and was made a house-monitor. There were six house-monitors. One of them was the house games-captain, a friendly easy-going fellow. He said to me one day. "Look here, Graves, I have been asked to send in a list of competitors for the inter-house boxing competition, shall I put your name down?" I hadn't ~~boxed~~ ^{boxed} ~~for~~ for two terms. I had been busy with football and played for the house-team now. And since my coolness with Raymond boxing had lost its interest. I said "I'm not boxing these days." "Well," he said, "Young Alan is entering for the welter-weights, ~~and has~~ ^{He's got} a very good chance. Why don't you enter for the welter-weights too? You might be able to damage one or two of the stronger men and make it easier for him." I didn't particularly like the idea of making things easier for Alan, but I (obviously) ^{must} enter the competition. I had a reputation to keep up. I knew that my wind, though all right for football was not equal to boxing round after round. I decided that my fights must be short. The night before the competition I smuggled a bottle of cherry-whisky into the house. I would shorten the fights on that.

I had never drunk anything alcoholic before in my life. When I was seven years old I ^{was} ~~had~~ prevailed on to sign the pledge. ~~I had signed the~~ ^{My} pledge card, ~~it~~ had bound me to abstain (from all spirituous liquors) by the Grace of God ^{it. But my} so long as I retained ~~the card~~. My mother had taken the card from me and put it ^{safely} ~~in a safe place~~. ~~I had hidden it~~ ~~in the~~ box-room ~~where my mother kept the family~~ ~~treasures, such as~~ ^{with} the Jacobean silver inherited from my Cheyne grandmother, ^{Bishop Graves'} ~~the~~ diamond ring ~~of Bishop Graves'~~ which ~~was given to~~ ^{gar him} Queen Victoria when he preached before her, ~~our~~ our christening mugs, and the heavy early Victorian jewelry bequeathed to my mother by the old lady whom she had looked after. ~~I had learned that things~~ ~~in the safe could only be taken out~~ ~~by~~ ~~myself~~ ^{And since box-room treasures never left the box-room} ~~myself~~ ^{myself as permanently parted from my pledge.} I regarded ~~the pledge as~~ ~~void~~ ~~and~~ ~~was~~ ~~free~~ ~~to~~ ~~take~~ ~~my~~ ~~pleasure~~ ~~in~~ ~~the~~ ~~cherry-whisky~~ ~~as~~ ~~before~~. I liked the cherry-whisky a lot.

The competitions started about one o'clock on a Saturday afternoon and went on until dark. I was drawn for the very first fight and my opponent by a piece of bad luck was Alan. Alan wanted me to scratch. I said I thought that it would look bad to do that. We consulted the Captain of the House and he said "No, the most sporting thing to do is to box it out and let the decision be on points; but don't either of you hurt each other." So we boxed. Alan started showing off to his friends who were sitting in the front row. I said, "Stop that. We're boxing, not fighting," but a few seconds later he hit me again unnecessarily hard. I got angry and knocked him out. This was the first time I had ever knocked anyone out and I liked the feeling. I had drunk a lot of cherry-whisky. I rather muzzily realised that I had knocked him out with a right swing on the side of the neck and that this blow was not part of the ordinary school-boxing curriculum. Straight lefts; left-to-body, right-to-head; left and right hooks; all these were known, but the swing was somehow neglected, probably because it was not so "pretty."

I went to the changing-room for my coat, and ~~was~~ ^{stout} Sergeant Harris the boxing-instructor said "Look here, Mr. Graves, why don't you put down your name for the middle-weight competition too?" I ^{cheerfully} ~~drunkenly~~ agreed. Then went back to the House and had a cold bath and more cherry-whisky. My next fight was to take place in about half an hour for the first round of the middle weights. This time my opponent, who was a stone heavier than myself but had little science, hustled me about for the first round and I could see that he would tire me out unless something was done. In the second round I knocked him down with my right swing, but he got up again. I ^{was} ~~began~~ feeling tired, so hastened to knock him down again. I must have knocked him down four or five times that round, but he refused to take the count. I found out afterwards that he was, like myself, conscious that Dick was watching the fight. He ~~was~~ ^{loved} Dick too. Finally I said to myself as he lurched towards me again: "If he doesn't go down and stay down this time, I won't be able to hit him again at all." This time I just pushed at his jaw as it offered itself to me, but that was enough. He did go down and he did stay down. This second knock-out made quite a stir. Knock-outs were rare in the inter-house boxing competition. As I went back to the House for another cold bath and some more cherry-whisky I noticed ^{the} ~~people~~ ^{fellows} looking at me curiously.

The later stages of the competition I ~~don't~~ ^{do not} remember well. The only opponent that I was now at all concerned about was Raymond, who was nearly a stone heavier than myself and was expected to win the middle weights; but he had also tried for two weights, the middle and the heavy, and had just had such a tough fight with the eventual winner of the heavy weights that he was in no proper condition to fight. So he scratched his fight with me. I believe that he would have fought all the same if it had been against someone else; but he was still fond of me and wanted me to win. His scratching would give me a rest between my bouts. Someone else scratched against me in the welter weights, so I only had three more fights, and I let neither of these go beyond the first round. The swing won me both weights, for which I ^{was given} ~~got~~ two silver cups. But it had also broken both my thumbs; I had not got my elbow high enough over when I used it.

The most important thing that happened to me in my last two years, apart from my attachment to this boy Dick, was that I got to know George Mallory. He was twenty-six or twenty-seven then, not long up from Cambridge. He was so young looking that he was often mistaken for a member of the school. From the first he treated me as an equal and I used to spend a ~~good deal of~~ ^{spare} my time reading books in his room or going for walks with him in the country. He told me of the existence of modern authors. My father being two generations older than myself and my only link with books, I had never heard of people like Shaw, Samuel Butler, Rupert Brooke, Wells, Flecker, ^{or} Masefield, and I was greatly interested in them. It was at George Mallory's rooms that I first met Edward Marsh, who has always been a good friend to me and with whom, though we seldom see each other now, I have never fallen out: in this he is unique among my ~~former~~ ^{pre-war} friends. Marsh said that he liked my poems, which George had showed him, but he pointed out they were written in the poetic vocabulary of fifty years ago and that though the quality of the poem was not necessarily impaired by this, there would be a natural prejudice in my readers against work written in 1913 in the fashions of 1873.

George Mallory, Cyril Hartmann, now well-known as a biographer, Raymond and myself published a magazine in the summer of 1913 called Green Chartreuse. It was only intended to have one number; new magazines at a public school always sell out the first number and lose heavily on the second. From Green Chartreuse I quote one of my own contributions, of autobiographical interest, written in the school dialect :-

My New-Bug's Exam.

When lights went out at half-past nine in the evening of the second Friday in the Quarter, and the faint footfalls of the departing House Master were heard no more, the fun began.

The Head of Under Cubicles constituted himself examiner and executioner, and was ably assisted by a timekeeper, a question-recorder, and a staff of his disreputable friends. I was a timorous "new-bug" then, and my pyjamas were damp with the perspiration of fear. Three of my fellows had been examined and sentenced before the inquisition was directed against me.

"It's Jones' turn now," said a voice. "He's the little brute that hacked me in run-about to-day. We must set him some tight questions!"

"I say, Jones, what's the colour of the House Master - I mean what's the name of the House Master of the House, whose colours are black and white? One, two, three"

"Mr. Girdlestone" my voice quivered in the darkness.

"He evidently knows the simpler colours. We'll muddle him. What are the colours of the Clubs to which Block Houses belong? One, two, three, four"

I had been slaving at getting up these questions for days, and just managed to blurt out the answer before being counted out.

"Two questions. No misses. We must buck up," said someone.

"I say, Jones, how do you get to Farncombe from Weekites? One, two, three"

I had only issued directions as far as Bridge before being counted out.

"Three questions. One miss. You're allowed three misses out of ten."

"Where is Charterhouse Magazine? One, two, three, four"

"Do you mean The Carthusian office?" I asked. Everyone laughed.

"Four questions. Two misses. I say, Robinson, he's answered far too many. We'll set him a couple of stingers."

Much whispering.

"What is the age of the horse that rolls Under Green? One, two, three"

"Six!" I said, at a venture.

"Wrong; thirty-eight. Six questions. Three misses! Think yourself lucky you weren't asked its pedigree."

"What are canoeing colours? One, two, thr"

"There aren't any!"

"You'll get cocked-up for festivity; but you can count it. Seven questions. Three misses. Jones?"

"Yes!"

"What was the name of the girl to whom rumour stated that last year's football secretary was violently attached? One, two, three, four"

"Daisy!" (it sounded a likely name).

"Oh really! Well, I happen to know last year's football secretary; and he'll simply kill you for spreading scandal. You're wrong anyhow. Eight questions. Four misses!"

"You'll come to my 'cube' at seven to-morrow morning; See? Good-night!"

Here he waved his hair brush over the candle, and a colossal shadow appeared on the ceiling.

The Poetry Society died about this time - and this is how it died. Two of its sixth-form members came to ^aone meeting and each read a rather dull and formal poem about love and nature; none of us paid much attention to them. But the following week they were published in the Carthusian and soon everyone was pointing and giggling. Both poems, which were signed with pseudonyms, were acrostics, the initial letters spelling out a 'case.' 'Case' meant 'romance'

a formal coupling of two boys' names, with the name of the elder boy first. In these two cases both the first names mentioned were those of bloods. It was a foolish act of aggression in the feud between Sixth Form and the bloods. But nothing much would have come of it, had not another of the sixth-form members of the Poetry Society been ~~mentioned~~ in love with one of the two smaller boys whose names appeared in the acrostics. In rage and jealousy he went to the headmaster and called his attention to the acrostic - which otherwise neither he nor any other of the masters would have noticed. He pretended that he did not know the authors, ~~but~~ ^{but though} he had not been at the particular meeting where the poems were read, ~~but~~ ^{them from} he could easily have guessed ~~the~~ the style. Before things had taken this turn I had incautiously told someone who the authors were; so I was ^{now} dragged into the row as a witness against them. The headmaster took a very serious view of the case. The two poets were deprived of their monitorial privileges, the editor of the Carthusian who, though aware of the acrostics, had accepted the poems, was deprived of his editorship and of his position as head of the school. The informer, who happened to be next in school-order, succeeded him in both capacities; he had not expected this ^{development} and it made him most unpopular. His consolation was a real one, that he had done it all for love, to avenge the public insult done to the boy. And he was a decent fellow, really. The Poetry Society was dissolved in disgrace by the headmaster's orders. Guy Kendall was one of the few masters who insisted on treating the boys better than they deserved, so I was ~~very~~ sorry for him when this happened; it was an 'I told you so' for the other masters who did not believe either in poetry or in school uplift societies.

I owe a great debt of gratitude to Kendall; the meetings of the Poetry Society were ~~the only things that~~ all that I had to look forward to ~~going from one month to the next~~ when things were at their worst for me.

CHAPTER VII.

George did something better than lend me books and that was to take me climbing on Snowdon in the school vacations. I knew Snowdon very well from a distance, from my bedroom window at Harlech. In the spring its snow cap was the most sentimental glory of the landscape. The first time I went with George to Snowdon we stayed at the Snowdon Ranger Hotel at Quellyn Lake. It was January and the mountain was covered with snow. We did little rock-climbing but went up some good snow slopes with rope and ice-axe. I remember one climb the objective of which was the summit; we found the hotel there with its roof blown off in the blizzard of the previous night. We sat by the cairn and ate Carlsbad plums and liver ^{-5 sausages} sandwiches. Geoffrey Keynes, the editor of ^{The Nonesuch} Blake, was there; he and George, who used to go drunk with excitement at the end of his climbs, picked stones off the cairn and shied them at the chimney stack of the hotel until they had sent it where the roof was.

George Mallory was one of the three or four best climbers in climbing history. His first season in the Alps had been spectacular; nobody had expected him to survive it. He never lost his daring, even foolhardiness, but learned all that there was to be learned about ^{climbing} technique. ~~One~~ One always felt absolutely safe with him on the rope. George went through the war as a lieutenant in the Artillery, but his nerves ^{were} ~~seemed~~ ^{apparently} unaffected; on his leaves he went rock-climbing. ~~He~~ ~~was~~ ~~killed~~ ~~in~~ ~~July~~ ~~1921~~

When the war ended he was more in love with the mountains than ever. His death on Mount Everest came five years later. No one knows whether he and Irvine actually made the last five hundred yards of the climb or whether they turned back or what happened: but anyone who had climbed with George felt convinced that he did get to the summit, that he rejoiced in his accustomed way and had not sufficient reserve of strength left for the descent. I ~~don't~~^{not} think that it was ever mentioned in the newspaper account of his death that George originally took to climbing when he was a scholar at Winchester as a corrective to his weak heart.

George was ~~an intensely~~ ~~and~~ ~~was~~ ~~generally~~ ~~despised~~ ~~at~~ ~~Charterhouse,~~ ~~where~~ ~~he~~ ~~was~~ ~~generally~~ ~~despised~~ ~~by~~ ~~the~~ ~~boys~~ ~~because~~ ~~he~~ ~~was~~ ~~not~~ ~~a~~ ~~disciplinarian~~ ~~or~~ ~~interested~~ ~~in~~ ~~cricket~~ ~~or~~ ~~football.~~ He tried to treat his ~~classes~~ ~~in~~ ~~a~~ ~~friendly~~ ~~way~~ ~~and~~ ~~that~~ ~~puzzled~~ ~~and~~ ~~offended~~ ~~them.~~ There was a tradition in the school of concealed warfare between the boys and the masters. It was considered ~~no shame~~ ~~to~~ ~~cheat,~~ ~~to~~ ~~lie~~ ~~or~~ ~~to~~ ~~deceive~~ ~~where~~ ~~a~~ ~~master~~ ~~was~~ ~~concerned;~~ ~~to~~ ~~do~~ ~~the~~ ~~same~~ ~~to~~ ~~a~~ ~~member~~ ~~of~~ ~~the~~ ~~school~~ ~~was~~ ~~equally~~ ~~immoral.~~ George was also unpopular with the house-masters because he refused to accept this state of war and fraternized with the enemy whenever he could. When two who had been particularly unfriendly to him happened to die within a short time of each other he joked to me: "See, Robert, how mine enemies flee before my face." I always called him by his Christian name and so did three or four more of his friends in the school. This lack of dignity in him put him beyond the pale both with the boys and the masters. Eventually the falseness of his position told on his temper, yet he ~~was~~ always managed to find four or five boys in the school who were, like him, out of their element and ~~was~~ befriended them and made life tolerable for them. Before the final Everest Expedition he had decided to resign and do educational work at Cambridge with, I believe, the Workers' Educational Association. He was tired of trying to teach gentlemen to be gentlemen.

I spent a season with George and a large number of climbers at the hotel at Pen-y-Pass on Snowdon in the spring of 1914. This time it was real precipice-climbing and I was lucky enough to climb with George, with H.E.L. Porter, a renowned technician of climbing, with Kitty O'Brien and with Conor O'Brien ^{his brother,} who afterwards made a famous voyage round the world in a twenty-ton or five-ton ~~or there about~~ or some even-less-ton boat. Conor climbed principally, he told us, ~~because he had~~ ^{as a} ~~corrective~~ ^{to bad} nerves. He used to get very excited when any slight hitch occurred; his voice would rise to a scream. Kitty ~~was~~ used to chide him, "Ach Conor, dear, have a bit of wit" and Conor would apologise. Conor, being a sailor, used to climb in bare feet. ^{Often in climbing one has} ~~to~~ ^{one's} ~~to support the entire weight of~~ ^{— but toes in stiff boots.} ~~body on a couple of toes~~ ~~supported by the stiffness of a boot.~~ He said that he could force his ^{naked (further - to} toes) ^{than a boot would go -} in crevices ~~in~~

But the most honoured climber there was Geoffrey Young. Geoffrey had been climbing for a number of years and was President of the Climbers' Club. I was told that his four closest friends had all at different times been killed climbing. This was a comment on the extraordinary care with which he climbed himself. It was not merely shown in his preparations for a climb, the careful examination foot by foot of the alpine rope ~~that was given~~ ^{attention to his boot -} the ~~condition of the~~ nails ~~in his boots~~ and the balanced loading of his knapsack; but also in his

~~cautiousness in the climbing itself -~~ ^{Before making any} ~~move~~
~~the~~ ^{it} ~~thought~~ ^{out} ~~as though it~~ were a move in chess. If the next handhold happened to be just a little out of his reach or the next foothold seemed at all unsteady he would stop and think of some way round the difficulty. George used sometimes to get impatient but Geoffrey refused to be hurried. ^{He} ~~was~~ was short, which put him at a disadvantage in the matter of reach.
 He was not as double-jointed and prehensile as Porter or as magnificent as George, but he was the perfect climber.
 And still remains so. This in spite of having lost a leg while serving with a Red Cross Unit on the Italian Front.
 He climbs with an artificial leg. He has recently published the only satisfactory text book on rock climbing.

I was very proud to be climbing with Geoffrey Young. ^{And} ~~the greatest~~ ^{this} compliment ^{pleased me far more} than if the Post Laureats had told me that I had the finest sense of rhythm that he had ever met in a young poet.

~~He said,~~ ^{once} "Robert, you have the finest natural balance that I have ever seen in a climber."

^{It is quite true that I have} good balance; once in Switzerland it saved me from a broken leg or legs. My mother took us there in the Christmas holidays of 1913-14, ostensibly for winter sports but really because she thought that she owed it to my sisters to ^{give them a chance} ~~bring them to a place where they could~~ to meet nice young men of means. About the third day that I put on skis I went up from Champéry, where we were staying and the snow was too soft, to Morgins a thousand feet higher where it was like sugar. Here I found an ice-run for skeleton-toboggans. Without considering that skis have no purchase on ice at all, I launched myself down it.
 After a few yards my speed increased alarmingly and I suddenly realised what I ^{was in for} ~~was~~. There were several sharp turns in the run protected by high banks, and I had to trust entirely to body-balance to swerve round them. I reached the terminus still upright and had my eyes damned by a frightened sports-club official for having endangered my life on his territory.

In an essay on Climbing ^{That I wrote at the time I said it was} a sport that ma^{de} all others seem trivial.

"New climbs or new variations of old climbs are not made in a competitive spirit, but only because it is satisfactory to stand somewhere on the earth's surface where nobody else has stood before. ~~And it is good to be alone with a specially chosen~~
^{And it is good to be alone with a specially chosen} ~~band of people - people that one can~~ ^{band of people - people that one can} trust completely. Rock-climbing is one of the most dangerous sports possible unless one keeps to the rules, but if one does keep to the rules it is ^{reasonably} safe. ^{With} physical fitness in every member of the climbing team, a careful watch on the weather proper overhauling of climbing apparatus, ~~and~~ ^{& with no} ~~hurry, anxiety or stunting,~~ climbing is ~~safe~~

^{much}
[redacted] safer than [redacted] fox-hunting. In hunting there are uncontrollable factors, such as hidden wire, holes in which a horse may stumble, caprice or vice in the horse. The climber trusts entirely to his own feet, legs, hands, shoulders, sense of balance, judgment of distance."

The first climb^{on which} I was taken was ^{up} [redacted] Crib-y^d dysgel. It was a test climb for beginners. About fifty feet up from the scree, a height that is really more frightening than five hundred because death is almost as certain and much more immediate, there was a long sloping shelf of rock about the length of an ordinary room to be crossed from right to left. It was without handholds or footholds worth speaking of and too steep to stand upright or kneel on without slipping. It shelved at an angle of, I suppose, forty-five or fifty degrees. The accepted way to cross it was by rolling in an upright position and trusting to friction as a maintaining force. Once I got across this shelf without disaster I felt that the rest of the climb was easy. The climb was called The Gambit. Robert Trevellyan, the poet, was given this test in the previous season, I was told, and had been unlucky enough to fall off. He was pulled up short of course after a few feet by the rope of the leader, who was well belayed: but the experience disgusted him with climbing and he spent the rest of his time on the mountains just walking about.

Belaying simply means making fast a loop of the rope which is wound round one's waist on a projection of rock and so disposing the weight of the body that, if the climber above or below happens to slip and fall, the belay will hold and the whole party will not go down together. Alpine rope has a breaking point of a third its own length. Only one member of the climbing team is moving at any given time, the others are belayed. Sometimes on a precipice it is necessary to move up fifty or sixty feet before finding a secure belay as a point from which to start the next upward movement, so that if the leader falls and is unable to put on a brake in any way he must fall more than twice that length before being pulled up. On the same day I was taken on a spectacular though not unusually difficult climb on Crib Goch. At one point we traversed round a knife-edge buttress. From this knife-edge a pillar-like bit of rock, technically known as a monolith, had split away. We scrambled up the monolith which overhung the valley with a clear five hundred feet drop, and each in turn stood on the top and balanced. The next thing was to make a long careful stride from the top of the monolith to the rock-face; here there was a ledge just wide enough to take the toe of a boot, and a handhold at convenient height to give an easy pull-up to the next ledge. I remember George shouting down from above "Be careful of that foothold, Robert. Don't chip the edge off or the climb will be impossible for anyone who wants to do it again. It's got to last another five hundred years at least."

I was only in danger once. I was climbing with Porter on an out of the way part of the mountain. The climb, known as "The Ribbon Track and Girdle Traverse", had not been attempted for about ten years. About half way up we came to a chimney. A chimney is a vertical fissure in the rock wide enough to admit the body; a crack is only wide enough to admit the boot. One works up a chimney sideways with back and knees, but up a crack with one's face to the rock. Porter was leading and fifty feet above me in the chimney. In making a spring to a handhold slightly out of reach he dislodged a pile of stones that had been wedged in the chimney. They rattled down and one rather bigger than a cricket ball struck me on the head and knocked me out.

Fortunately I was well belayed and Porter was already in safety. The rope held me up, I recovered my senses a few seconds later and was able to continue.

The practice of Pen-y-Pass was to have a leisurely breakfast and lie in the sun with a tankard of beer before starting for the precipice foot in the late morning.

Snowdon ^{was} ~~is~~ a perfect mountain for climbing. The rock ^{was} ~~is~~ sound and not slippery. And once you ^{came} ~~got~~ to the top of any of the precipices, some of which ^{were} ~~are~~ a thousand feet high, but all just climbable one way or another, there ^{was} ~~is~~ always an easy way to run down. In the evening when we got back to the hotel ⁱⁿ ~~at~~ hot baths ~~we~~ (we lay and stewed.)

I remember wondering at my body, ~~the~~ the worn fingernails, ~~the~~ the bruised knees, and the lump of climbing muscle that had begun to bunch above the arch of the foot ~~and~~ ~~the~~ ~~mechanical~~ ~~beauty~~ ~~and~~ ~~strength~~ ~~for~~ ~~the~~ ~~climbing~~

^{seeing it as beautiful in relation to this new purpose -} ~~mechanical beauty and strength for the climbing~~ My worst climb was on Lliwedd, the most formidable of the precipices, when at a point that needed most concentration a raven circled round the party in great sweeps. This was curiously unsettling, because one climbs only ~~in~~ ~~one~~ ~~direction~~ up and down, or left and right, and the raven was suggesting ^{all the diverse possibilities of movement,} ~~all the diverse possibilities of movement,~~

~~tempting us to let go our hold & join him -~~

CHAPTER VIII.

My last year at Charterhouse I devoted myself to doing everything I could to show how little respect I had for the ^{school} tradition ~~of the place~~. In the winter of 1913 I won a classical exhibition at St. John's College, Oxford, so that I could go slow on school work. ~~I~~ and Nevill Barbour ^{and I} were editing the school paper and a good deal of my time went in that. Nevill, who as a scholar had ~~had~~ ^{met} the same sort of difficulties as myself, also had his knife into the system. Editing the Carthusian gave us a good opportunity of paying off old grudges. There was a censor, one of the masters, so that we could not be too personal in what we wrote. We talked things over together and decided that the most objectionable tradition of all was compulsory games. Of these cricket was the most objectionable because it wasted most time in the best part of the year. We decided to concentrate on cricket.

We began in the correspondence column with pin-pricks - a letter, for instance, complaining that the services of the professional coach were only given to a few promising cricketers chosen by the games-master, while the rest of the school who paid the same subscriptions were never coached at all. Some house masters who were keen on their house winning the cricket cup would ~~even~~ ^{even} study the cricket form of preparatory schools and engage cricket bloods five or six years in advance. Then we wrote an article complaining of the effect on cricket of the compulsory system. We recorded that when friendly matches were played between teams picked from the duds of two [✓] houses the opposing captains, anxious to get away for a game of tennis or a bathe on the half-holiday, often agreed to play "tip and run." This prepared for a vigorous campaign in favour of tennis as against cricket. Not that Nevill and I cared much for tennis, but it was the best weapon we had against cricket. There were, at least, no tennis bloods and boys played tennis because they wanted to not because they had to. There were only two school tennis-courts, miserably kept. We worked our ^{elves} ~~seives~~ up about all the good half-holidays that had been stolen from us by compulsory cricket, the hours of vacant waiting about when our side was batting and the hours of waiting about as fielders in places where the ball never came. Cricket was the game ^{we wrote,} in which ~~the selfishness of the few was supposed to excuse the boredom of the many.~~ Tennis was quick and busy. We asked Old Carthusian tennis internationals to contribute letters proposing tennis as the manlier and more vigorous game. We even got the famous Anthony Wilding to write.

The games-masters were ^{scandalized} ~~scandalized~~ at this assault on cricket. ~~But~~ we had been holding back our trump card, which was that subscriptions for school tennis had for years been diverted to the cricket fund. The result of our campaign was surprising. A fund was started for providing the school with a number of tennis-courts and making Charterhouse the cradle of public-school tennis. Though delayed by the war, these courts actually appeared; I noticed them recently as I went past the school in a car; there seemed to be ^{plenty} ~~a lot~~ of them.

We enjoyed this Carthusian editing ~~the~~ ^{went up} sales by two hundred copies a month, which in a school of six hundred was ^{pretty} ~~a~~ good. ~~One~~ One day the gentlest of the masters spoke to Nevill and suggested that it would be a good thing perhaps if the Carthusian became less controversial, and that this was the general feeling among the staff. He added: "Of course, this is not a deputation."

Nevill said cruelly: "I take your word for it, but it is at least a coincidence that you were the representative chosen a week or two ago by the ^{other} masters as the only one with sufficient tact to apply to the Governing Body for a rise of salary." Later we found that the Carthusian was taking up too much of our time, so we decided to resign. ~~_____~~
~~_____~~ ^{in our last number} we smuggled a notice of our deaths into the usual black-edged obituary column. The censor was always cursory in his examination of births, marriages, reports of cricket matches and obituaries; ~~_____~~ he let it through. We put a motto from Montaigne at the top of the paper: "Truth and reason are common unto all ^{men} and are no more proper to those who spoke them heretofore than to those that shall speak them hereafter." That motto still, I believe, (remains) as a memorial of our editorship.

Poetry and ~~_____~~ Dick were now the ^{only} two ~~_____~~ things ^{that mattered.} ~~_____~~ My life with my fellow house-monitors was one of perpetual discord. I had grudges against them all except the house captain ^{& the head-monitor.} ~~_____~~ ^{House captain,} ~~_____~~ the only ^{blood} in the house, spent most of his time with his fellow bloods in other houses. ~~_____~~ The head-monitor ^{was} a scholar ^{who, though} ~~_____~~ had ^{been embittered by his first three years} ~~_____~~ in the house ~~_____~~ ^{was} naturally a decent fellow, ~~_____~~ and ^{was} much on his dignity. He did more or less what the other monitors wanted him to do and I was sorry that I had to lump him in with the rest. My love for Dick provoked a constant facetiousness, but they never dared to go too far. I once caught one of them in the bathroom scratching up a pair of hearts conjoined, with Dick's initials and mine on them. I pushed him into the bath and turned the taps on. The next day he got hold of a manuscript notebook of mine that I had left on the table in the monitors' room with some other books. It had poems and essay notes in it. He and the other monitors, except the house captain, annotated it critically in blue chalk; and all signed their initials. The house-captain would have nothing to do with this: he thought it ungentlemanly. I was furious when I found what had been done: I made a speech. I demanded a signed apology. I said that if I were not given it within an hour I would choose one of them as solely responsible and punish him. I said that I would now have a bath and that the first monitor that I met after my bath I would knock down.

Whether by accident or whether it was that he thought his position made him secure, the first monitor I met in the corridor was the head monitor, I knock^d him down. It was the time of evening preparation, which only the monitors were free not to attend. But a junior happened to pass on the way to the lavatory and saw ^{the boy & the girl; so} it could not be hushed up. The head-monitor went to the house-master and the house-master sent for me. He was an excitable elderly man who had some difficulty in controlling his spittle when angry. He made me sit down in a chair in his study, then stood over me clenching his fists and crying in his high falsetto voice: "Do you realise you have done a very brutal action?" His mouth was bubbling. I was as angry as he was. I jumped up and clenched my fists too. Then I said that I would do the same thing to anyone who, after scribbling ^{impertinent} remarks on my private papers, refused to apologise. "Private papers. Filthy poems" said the house-master. So I said: "All right" threateningly and went out.

Later I was informed by the head monitor that disciplinary action had been decided upon. The house-master had decided to deprive me of the right to fag for the rest of the term. This amused me because I so loathed my own fagging days that except in an emergency I never used to fag anyone ~~but~~. My enemy-monitors fagged more than necessary as a means of keeping up their dignity. They were none of them much good at games so they had to assert it somehow. When the fags heard of all this they talked of mutinying and refusing to fag for anyone except the house-captain. But it never came to a mutiny. They were merely dilatory in answering fag calls and wasted as much time as they dared by forgetting messages and fetching the wrong things. The head-fag came and told me that if I ever wanted anybody to fag for me he would always find someone. So I had the privileges of being monitor without any of the responsibilities.

I had another difficult interview with the Headmaster over this. But it was my last term) so he allowed me to finish my five years without ignominy. He was puzzled by the frankness of my statement of love for Dick. He reopened the question. I refused to be ashamed. I heard afterwards that he had said that this was one of the rare cases of a friendship between boys of unequal ages which he felt was essentially moral. I went through one of the worst quarters of an hour of my life on Dick's account in this last term. When the master had warned me about exchanging glances with Dick in chapel I had been infuriated. But when I was told by one of the boys that ~~he~~ he had seen the master surreptitiously kissing Dick ^{once,} on a choir treat or some such occasion, I went quite mad. I asked for no details or confirmation, I went to the master and told him he must resign or I would report the case to the Headmaster. He already had a reputation in the school. I said, for this sort of thing, I was morally outraged. Probably my sense of outrage concealed a murderous jealousy. I was surprised when he vigorously denied the charge; I could not guess what was going to happen next. But I said: "Well, come to the headmaster and deny it to him." He asked: "Did the boy tell you this himself?" I said "No." "Well then," he said, "I'll send for him here and ~~ask him~~ ^{he shall tell us} the truth ~~in front of us~~." So Dick was sent for and arrived looking very frightened and the house-master said ^{menacingly}: "Graves tells me that I once kissed you. Is that true?" ~~_____~~ Dick said: "Yes, it is true." So Dick was dismissed and the master collapsed and I felt ~~_____~~ ^{miserable}. He said he would resign at the end of the term, which was quite near, on ~~the~~ grounds of ill-health. ~~He~~ even thanked me for ~~_____~~ ^{speaking} directly to him and not ^{going} to the headmaster. That was in the summer of 1914; he went into the Army and was killed ~~_____~~ the next year. ~~_____~~ I found out much later from Dick that he had not been kissed at all. It may have been some other boy.

One of the last events that I remember at Charter-house was a debate with the motion that "this House is in favour of compulsory military service." The Empire Service League, or whatever it was called, of which Earl Roberts of Kandahar, V.C., was the President, sent down a propagandist to support the motion. There were only six votes out of one hundred and nineteen cast against it. I was the principal speaker against the motion, a convinced anti-militarist. I had recently resigned from the Officers'

Training Corps, having revolted against the theory of implicit obedience to orders. ~~_____~~ ^{And during a fortnight spent the previous summer} at the O.T.C. camp at Tidworth on Salisbury Plain, ~~_____~~ ^{I had been frightened} by a special ~~_____~~ ^{display of} the latest military ~~_____~~ ^{fortifications}, barbed-wire entanglements, machine-guns and field artillery in action ~~_____~~. General, now Field Marshal Sir William Robertson, whose son was a member of the school, had visited the camp and impressed upon us that war against Germany was inevitable within two or three years and that we must be prepared to take our part in it as leaders of the new forces that would assuredly be called into being. Of the six voters against the motion Nevill Barbour and I are, I believe, the only ones who survived the war.

My last memory was the Headmaster's good-bye. It was this: "Well good-bye, Graves, and remember this, that your best friend is the waste-paper basket." ~~_____~~ the infantry.

86 B

I used to speculate on which of my contemporaries ~~_____~~ would distinguish themselves after they left school. The war upset my calculations. ~~_____~~
Many ^{dull} boys ~~_____~~ had ^{bright} ~~_____~~ brilliant ^{military careers, particularly} ~~_____~~ as air-fighters, ~~_____~~ ^{and a high proportion of the school went into the Royal} ~~_____~~ ~~_____~~ ^{some becoming} ~~_____~~ squadron and ~~_____~~ ^{flight} commanders. "Fuzzy" McNair, the head of the school, ~~_____~~ ~~_____~~ won the V.C. as a Rifleman; young Sturgess, who had been my study fag, distinguished himself more unfortunately by flying the first heavy bombing machine of a new pattern across the Channel on his first trip to France and making a beautiful landing (having mistaken the landmarks) at an aerodrome behind the German lines. ~~_____~~ A boy whom I admired very much during my first year at Charterhouse was the Hon. Desmond O'Brien, ~~_____~~ who was the only Carthusian in my time ^{who cheerfully} ~~_____~~ ^{disregard} ~~_____~~ of all school-rules. He had skeleton keys for the school library, chapel, and science laboratories and used to break out of his house at night and carefully disarrange things ^{there}. The then Headmaster was fond of O'Brien and forgave him much. O'Brien had the key of the Headmaster's study too, and ^{going} ~~_____~~ there one night with an electric torch, ~~_____~~ carried off a memorandum which he showed me. "Must expel O'Brien." He had a wireless receiving station in one of the ~~_____~~ copses on the school grounds ~~_____~~ ^{discovered} out-of-bounds, and he ~~_____~~ a ventilator shaft down which he could hoot into the school library from outside and create great disturbance without detection. One day the school was threatened with the loss of Saturday half-holiday because some member of the school had killed a cow with a catapult, and nobody would own up. O'Brien had fired the shot; he was away at the time on special leave for a sister's wedding. A friend wrote to him about the half-holiday. He sent the Headmaster a telegram: "Killed cow sorry coming O'Brien." At last, having absented himself from every lesson and chapel for three whole days, he was expelled. He was killed ^{early} in the war ^{while} bombing Bruges.

86c

TP At least one in three of my generation at school was killed - This was because they all took commissions as soon as they could, most of them in the infantry & flying-corps. The average life of the Infantry Subaltern on the Western Front was at some stages of the war only about three months; that is, at the end of three months he was either wounded or killed. ~~_____~~ ^{that worked out at} about four wounded to every one killed; Of the ~~_____~~ four ~~_____~~ one was ~~_____~~ ^{wounded} seriously and the remaining three more or less lightly ~~_____~~. The ~~_____~~ three lightly wounded ~~_____~~ ^{the front} returned to ~~_____~~ after a few weeks or months ^{of absence} and were again subject to the same odds. ^{The flying casualties were even higher.} Since the war lasted for four and a half years ~~_____~~

~~_____~~, it is easy to see why the mortality was so high ^{among my contemporaries} and why most of the survivors, if not permanently disabled, were wounded at least two or three times. The first six members of the sixth form in school order were all killed.

X well-known sportsmen were contemporaries of mine; A. G. Bower, captain of England at Soccer, who was only an average player at Charterhouse, and Woolf Barnato, the Surrey cricketer and racing motorist ^{who also} ~~_____~~ ^{Barnato} was only an average ~~_____~~ was in the same house as myself and we had not a word to say to each other for the four years we were together. Then there were a number of familiar food and drink names in the school-list in my time and I suppose that such of them as survived the war are partners now in their fathers' firms. Five ~~_____~~ scholars have made names for themselves - Richard Hughes as a B.B.C. playwright, Richard Goolden as an actor of old-man parts, Vincent Seligman as author of a propagandist life of Venizelos, Cyril Hartmann as an authority on historical French scandals, and my brother Charles as society gossip-writer on the middle page of The Daily Mail. Occasionally I see another name or two in the newspapers. There was one the other day -- M.... who was in the news for escaping from a private ^{lunatic} asylum.

I remembered that he had ~~_____~~ once offered a boy ten shillings to hold his hand in a thunderstorm and that he had frequently threatened to run away from Charterhouse.

CHAPTER IX.

I was at Harlech when the war came; I decided to enlist a day or two later. ~~_____~~
~~_____~~ ^{by the first place} though only a very short war was expected, ^{two or three months at the very outside} I thought that it might last just long enough to delay my going to Oxford. ^{in October, which I broke} ~~_____~~

I did not work out the possibilities of being actively engaged in the war. I thought that it would ^{mean} ~~_____~~ ^{Garrison-isms} ~~_____~~ at home while the regular forces were ^{away.} ~~_____~~ ^{In the second place} ~~_____~~ I entirely believed ~~_____~~ ^{had been} that France and England ~~_____~~ drawn ~~_____~~ into a war which they had never contemplated and for which they were entirely unprepared. It never occurred to me that newspapers and statesmen could lie, ^{I forget my pacifism} ~~_____~~ I was ready ~~_____~~ to believe the worst of the Germans. ~~_____~~ ^{to read of cynical} I was outraged ^h the violation of the Belgian neutrality. ^I ~~_____~~ wrote a ~~_____~~ poem ~~_____~~ promising vengeance for Louvain. I discounted perhaps twenty per cent of the atrocity details as war-time exaggeration. ^{That} ~~_____~~ ^{of course,} was not enough. The following contemporary newspaper cuttings are in chronological order :

"When the fall of Antwerp got known the church bells were rung". (i.e., Cologne and elsewhere in Germany). - Kölnische Zeitung.

"According to the 'Kölnische Zeitung' the clergy of Antwerp were compelled to ring the church bells when the fortress was taken." - Le Matin. (Paris).

"According to what 'The Times' has heard from Cologne via Paris the unfortunate Belgian priests who refused to ring the church bells when Antwerp was taken have been sentenced to hard labour." - Corriere della Sera. (Milan).

"According to information to the 'Corriere della Sera' from Cologne via London, it is confirmed that the barbaric conquerors of Antwerp punished the unfortunate Belgian priests for their heroic refusal to ring the church bells by hanging them as living clappers to the bells with their heads down." - Le Matin (Paris).

When I was in the trenches a few months later I happened to ^{belong} ~~_____~~ to a Company Mess in which four of us young officers out of five, had, by a coincidence, either German mothers or naturalized German fathers. One of them said: "Of course I'm glad I joined when I did. If I'd put it off for a month or two they'd have accused me of being a German spy. As it is I ^{have} ~~_____~~ an uncle interned at Alexandra Palace and my father's only been allowed to retain the membership of his golf club because he has two sons in the trenches." I said: "Well, ^{I have} ~~three~~ three or ^{a number of} four uncles sitting somewhere opposite, and ~~and~~ cousins too. One of my uncles is a ^{Bavarian} General. But that's all right. I don't brag about them. I only advertise ^{the} ~~my~~ uncle who is a British admiral commanding at the Nore."

It was not of course until some time after the war that I had any particulars of my German relations who had been fighting opposite. There was my cousin Conrad, the same age as myself, who was the son of the German Consul at Zurich. ^{In} January 1914 I had gone ~~to~~ ^{the city} ski-ing with him ~~in~~ between the trees in the woods above ~~the~~. We had tobogganed together down the Dolderstrasse in Zurich itself, where the lamp-posts were all sandbagged and family toboggans, skidding ~~on~~ broadside on, were frequently being crashed into by single-seater ~~skis~~ skeletons; ~~the~~ arms and legs were broken by the score and the crowds thought it a great joke. Conrad served with a crack Bavarian regiment all through the war and won the ~~the~~ ^{more rarely awarded than the British} Pour le Merite order, which is ~~the~~ Victoria Cross. He was killed by the Bolsheviks after the war in a village on the Baltic where he had been sent to make requisitions. He was a gentle, proud creature whose chief interest was natural history. He used to spend hours in the woods studying the habits of wild animals; he felt strongly against shooting them.

Perhaps the most outstanding military feat was that of one of my uncles who was dug out at the age of sixty or so as a lieutenant in the Bavarian Artillery. My youngest brother met him a year or two ago and happened to mention that he was going to visit Rheims. My uncle ^{nudged him} ~~said~~: "Have a look at the Cathedral. I was there with my battery in the war. One day the divisional general came up to me and said: 'Lieutenant ^{von} Ranke, I understand that you are a Lutheran, not a Catholic?' I said that this was

Then he said:

so. [redacted] 'I have a very disagreeable service for you to perform, ^{Lieutenant} [redacted] von Ranke. Those misbegotten swine, the French, are using the Cathedral for an ✓ observation post. They think they can get away with it because it's Rheims Cathedral, but this is war and they ✓ have [redacted] our trenches taped from there. So I call upon you to dislodge them.' I only needed to fire two rounds and down came the pinnacle and the Frenchmen with it.
It was a very neat bit of shooting. I was proud to have limited the damage like that. Really, you must go and have a look at it."

~~CHAPTER~~

The nearest regimental depot was at Wrexham; the Royal Welch Fusiliers. The Harlech golf secretary suggested my taking a commission instead of enlisting. He rang up the adjutant and said that I was a public-school boy who had been in the Officers Training Corps at Charterhouse. So the adjutant said, "Send him right along" and on August 11th I started my training. I immediately became a hero to my family. My mother, who said to me "My race has gone mad", regarded my going as a religious act; my father was proud that I had "done the right thing," ~~and~~ ^{a time} ~~lost~~ I even recovered for ~~the~~ ^{of the Spectator & Punch} the respect of my uncle C. L. Graves, with whom I had recently had a ~~row~~ ^{tiff}. He had given me a sovereign tip two terms previously and I had written ~~my~~ ^{my thanks, saying} ~~thank you, telling him~~ that with it I had bought Samuel Butler's Note Books, The Way of All Flesh and the two Erewhons. ^{To my surprise} this had infuriated him. ~~and~~

The fellows who applied for commissions at the same time as myself were for the most part boys who had recently failed to pass into the Royal Military College at Sandhurst and were trying to get into the regular army by the old militia door, ~~or~~ ^{what was known as the} ~~Special Reserve of Officers.~~ ^{fellows} There were only one or two ~~people~~ who had gone into the army, like myself, for the sake of the war and not for the sake of a career. There were about a dozen of us recruit officers on the Square^W learning to drill and be drilled. My Officers Training Corps experience made this part easy but I knew nothing about army traditions and made all the worst mistakes: saluting the bandmaster, failing to recognise the Colonel when in mufti, walking in the street without a belt and talking shop in the mess. But I soon learned to conform. My greatest difficulty was ~~to~~ ^{to} talk ~~to~~ to men of the company to which I was posted with the necessary air of authority.

to Lancaster, under the escort of ~~no less than~~ ^{fifty} Manchester police ~~men~~ armed with carbines. ^{But} ~~it~~ it was true because I was the officer who took them over from the Chief Inspector ~~...~~ ~~...~~. He was a fine figure in frogged uniform and gave me a splendid salute. I signed him a receipt for his prisoners and he gave me another salute. He had done his job well and was proud of it. ^{mishap} The only ~~...~~ was the accidental breaking of two carriage-windows by the slung carbines.

Wolff also said that even children were interned in the camp. This was true. There were a dozen or so little boys from the German bands who had been interned because it seemed ^{more humane} ~~...~~ to keep them with their friends than ^{to send} them ~~...~~ ^{to a work-house} ~~...~~. Their ^{safety in the camp} ~~well-being~~ caused the commandant great concern.

I had a detachment of fifty Special Reservists, most of them with only about six weeks' service. They had joined the Army just before war started as a cheap way of getting a holiday at the training camp; to find themselves forced to continue beyond the usual fortnight annoyed them. They were a rough lot, Welshmen from the border counties, and were constantly deserting and having to be fetched back by the police. They made nervous sentries and were more frightened of the prisoners than the prisoners were of them. Going the round of sentries on a dark night about 2 a.m. was dangerous.
Very often my lantern used to blow out and I would fumble to light it again ⁱⁿ the dark and hear the frightened voice of ^a ~~...~~ ~~...~~ sentry roar out "Halt! Who goes there?" and know that he was standing with his rifle aimed and his magazine charged with five live rounds. I used to gasp out the password just in time. ~~The~~ Rifles were often being fired off at shadows.
The prisoners were a rowdy lot; the sailors particularly were always fighting. I saw a prisoner spitting out teeth and blood one morning. I asked him what was wrong. "O sir, one no-good friend give me one clap on the chops." Frequent deputations were sent to complain of the ^{dullness of the} food; it was the same ration food that was served to the troops. But after a while they realised the war and settled down to sullen docility; they started hobbies and glee parties and games and plans for escape. I had far more trouble with my men. They were always breaking out of their quarters. I could never find out how they did it. I watched all the possible exits but caught no one. Finally I discovered that they used to crawl out through a ^{sewer} [redacted]. They [redacted] boasted of their successes with the women. [redacted] Private Kirby ^{said} to me "Do you know, sir, on the Sunday after we arrived, all the preachers in Lancaster took as their text 'Mothers take care of your daughters; The Royal Welch have come to Town.'"

The Camp Staff consisted of :-

A father ^{ly} Colonel of the Loyal North Lancashire Regiment, the Commandant.

His secretary, by name C.B. Gull, one of the ^{best known} pre-war ^{figures in} [redacted] Oxford, owner of the Isis and combined divinity and athletics coach. He used to box with me in the dormitory we shared. He also sponsored me as a candidate for the local lodge of The Royal Antediluvian Order of Buffaloes. I suppose that I am still a member; [redacted]

[redacted] The ~~City~~ Grand Marshal who officiated at my initiation ^{had} [redacted] ^{four or five} drunk ^{drunk} [redacted] and continually short-circuited in the ritual [redacted] ^{He kept on returning to the part} [redacted] where they intone :-

City Marshal: Spirit of true Buffaloism hover around us.

Response: Benevolence and joy ever attend us!

The assistant commandant, who alleged that he ^{had} [redacted] ten years ^{more seniority than any other} [redacted] major in the British Army and ^{made} [redacted] in the [redacted] wistful [redacted] ^{jokes about his lost virility. This recurrent theme was} [redacted]

[redacted] "If you ^{only} knew how much that would mean to an old man like me."

The adjutant, an East Lancashire lieutenant by name

~~Deane~~ had held up the neutral liner on which a German armed-cruiser ~~_____~~ and taken him off.
 he was sailing home from the Cape ~~_____~~ forced to give his
 The day after war was declared, He was ~~_____~~ parole not to fight against Germany in the War. The cruiser was subsequently sunk by a British ship, the Highflyer, and ~~_____~~ ^{Deane} was rescued; but the signed parole was saved by the German captain who escaped in a boat and gave it in charge of the German consul at Las Palmas. So ~~_____~~ ^{Deane} was forbidden the trenches and when I met him in 1917 he was a Staff Colonel.

A ~~_____~~ doctor ^{who was the mess butoon. I broke the scabbard of my sword} on his back one night ~~_____~~

The interpreter ^a ~~_____~~ Thomas Cook ^{man who could speak} every European language but Basque. He admitted to a ~~_____~~ ~~_____~~ ^{ness in} Lithuanian ^{and when asked what his own} nationality was weak ~~_____~~ "I am ~~_____~~ Wagons-Lits."

I had an inconvenient accident ~~_____~~ The telephone bell was constantly going from Western Command Headquarters; it was installed in ^{an} ~~_____~~ office-room where ~~_____~~ ^{I slept on a sloping desk.} ~~_____~~ ^{was laid} ~~_____~~ ^{_____}. One night Pack-Saddle ~~_____~~ (the code-name for the Chief Supply Officer of the Western Command) rang up shortly after midnight with orders for the Commandant ^{They were} about the rationing of a batch of ^{four hundred} ~~_____~~ prisoners who were being sent up to him from Chester and North Wales. I was half asleep and not clever at the use of the telephone. In the middle of the conversation, which was difficult because a storm was going on at the time and Pack-Saddle was ^{irritable} ~~_____~~, the line seems to have been struck by lightning somewhere. I got a bad electric shock and was unable to use a telephone ^{properly again} ~~_____~~ until some ^{twelve} years ^{later} after the war. ^{seemed an unheroic part to be playing in} Guarding prisoners ~~_____~~

~~_____~~ the war ^{which had now reached a critical stage.} ~~_____~~ I ~~_____~~ wanted to be abroad fighting ~~_____~~. My training had been interrupted ^{and I knew that} ~~_____~~ even when I was recalled ^{from} ~~_____~~ detachment duty I ~~_____~~ would have to wait a month or two at least before being sent out. When I got back ⁱⁿ October (to the Depot) I found myself stale. The adjutant, a ~~_____~~ keen soldier, decided that there were two things wrong with me. First of all, I dressed badly. I had apparently gone to the wrong tailor, and had also had a soldier-servant palmed off on me who was no good. He did not polish my buttons and shine my belt and boots as he should have done, and neglected me generally, as ~~_____~~ I had never had a valet before I did not know how to manage him or what to expect of him. The adjutant finally summoned me to the Orderly Room and threatened that he would not send me to France until I had entirely overhauled my wardrobe and looked more like a soldier. This put me in a fix because my pay only just

^{he said,}
 My company commander had reported me to him as "unsoldierlike and a nuisance."

covered the Mess bills and I knew that I could not ask my parents to buy me another outfit so soon after I had assured them that I had everything necessary. The adjutant, in the second place, decided that I was not a sportsman. This was because on the day that the Grand National (I think) was run, all the young officers applied for leave to see the race except myself, and I volunteered to take the job of Orderly Officer of the Day for someone who wanted to go. [REDACTED]

[REDACTED]

I ^{saw} [REDACTED] my contemporaries one by one being sent out to France to take the place of casualties in the first and second battalions, while I remained despondently at the Depot. But boxing once more ^{was useful} [REDACTED] Johnny Basham, a sergeant in the regiment, was training at the time for his fight ^(which he won) with Boswell for the Lonsdale Belt, welter-weight. I went down to the training camp one evening where Basham was offering to fight three rounds with any member of the regiment, the more the merrier. One of the officers put on the gloves and Basham got roars of laughter from the crowd as soon as he had taken his opponent's measure, by dodging about and playing the fool with him. I asked his manager if I could have a go. ^{He gave me a pair of} [REDACTED]

[REDACTED] shorts and I stepped into the ring. I pretended that I knew nothing about ^{boxing} [REDACTED] I led off with my right and moved about [REDACTED] clumsily. Basham saw a chance of getting another laugh; he dropped his guard and danced about with a you-can't-hit-me challenge. I caught him off his balance and knocked him across the ring. He recovered and went for me but I managed to keep on my feet; I laughed at him and he laughed too. We had three very brisk rounds and he was decent in making it seem that I was a much better boxer than I was by accommodating his pace to mine. As soon as the adjutant heard the story he rang me up at my billet and told me that he was very pleased to hear of my performance, that for an officer to [redacted] box [redacted] like that was a great encouragement to the men, that he was mistaken about my sportsmanship and that to show his appreciation he had put me down for a draft to go to France in a week's time.

Of the officers who had been sent out before me several had already been killed or wounded. Among the killed was Second-lieutenant W. G. Gladstone whom we called Glad Eyes. He was in his early ^{thirties} twenties; a grandson of old Gladstone whom he resembled in feature, a Liberal M.P. and Lord Lieutenant of his county. When war was hanging in the balance he had declared himself against it. His Hawarden tenantry were ashamed on his account and threatened, he told us, to duck him in the pond. Realising, once war was declared, that further protest was useless he immediately joined the regiment as a second-lieutenant. His political convictions remained. He was a man of great integrity and refused to take ^{the} non-combative employment as a staff-colonel offered him at Whitehall. When he went to France to the First Battalion he took no care of himself. He was killed by a sniper when unnecessarily exposing himself. His body was brought home for a military funeral at Hawarden; I attended it.

^{Three or} [redacted] or two random memories of this training period at Wrexham. The landlord of my billet was [redacted] a Welsh solicitor, who ^{greatly} overcharged us ^{while pretending great amicability. He} [redacted] wore a wig, or to be more exact, he had three wigs, with hair of progressive lengths. When he had worn the medium-sized hair for a few days he would put on the wig with long hair and say that, dear ^{him} [redacted], it was time to get a hair-cut. Then he ^{would} go out of the house and ^w [redacted] in [redacted] a public lavatory perhaps or a wayside copse [redacted] ^{would} change into the short-haired wig which he wore until it was time to ^{change} to the medium one again. This deception was only discovered when one of the officers billeted with me got drunk and raided his bedroom. This officer, whose name was Williams, ^{was an extreme example of the sly Border Welshman.} [redacted] The drunker he got, the more ^{shocking} his confessions. [redacted] He told me one day about a girl he had got engaged to in Dublin and even slept with on the ^{strength} [redacted] of a diamond engagement ring. Only paste really, he said. [redacted] The day before the wedding she had had a foot cut off by a Dalkey train and he had hurriedly left the city. "But, Graves, she was a lovely ^{love by} girl ^{before that happened} [redacted]" He had been a medical student at Trinity College, Dublin. [redacted] Whenever he went to Chester, [redacted] the nearest town, to pick up a prostitute, he not only used to appeal to her ^{patronism} [redacted] to charge him nothing,

[redacted] but he always gave her my name.
I knew of this because these women used to write to me.
One day I said to him in the mess "In future you are going to be distinguished from all the other Williams's in the regiment by being called "Dirty Williams." The name stuck.
By one shift or another he escaped all trench-service except for a short spell in a quiet sector and lasted the war out safely.

[redacted]
Private ^{Robinson.} [redacted] ^{He} was from Anglesey and had joined the Special Reserve before the war for his health. In September the entire battalion [redacted] volunteered for service overseas — except ^{Robinson} [redacted]. He said he would not go and ^{that} he could be neither ^{nor} [redacted] bullied [redacted] (coaxed). Finally he was brought ^{before} the colonel who was genuinely puzzled at his obstinacy.
^{Robinson} [redacted] explained "I have a wife and pigs at home." * The battalion was, in September, rigged out in a temporary navy-blue uniform until khaki might be available. All but ^{Robinson} [redacted] They decided to shame him. So he continued, by order, to wear the peace-time scarlet tunic and blue trousers with a stripe; a very dirty scarlet tunic, [redacted] (they had put him on the kitchen staff). [redacted] His mates called him "Cock Robin," and sang a popular chorus at him :-

"And I never get a knock
When the boys call Cock, Cockity ock, cock,
Cock Robin!
In my old red vest I mean to cut a shine."

But ^{Robinson} [redacted] did not care.

"For the more they call me Robin Redbreast I'll wear it longer still.
I will wear a red waistcoat, I will,
I will, I will, I will, I will, I will!"

So in October he was discharged as medically unfit - "of under-developed intelligence, unlikely to be of service in His Majesty's Forces." And went home to his wife and pigs.
While, of the singers, those who survived Festubert in the following May did not survive Loos in the following September.

* "Why," said the cobbler, "what should I do? Will you have me to go in the King's wars and to be killed for my labour?" "What, knave," said Skelton, "art thou a coward, having so great bones?" "No," said the cobbler, "I am not afared: it is good to sleep in a whole skin."

Recruit officers spent a good deal of their time at Company and Battalion Orderly Room, learning how to deal with crime. [redacted] of the war there [redacted]. Crime, of course, meant any breach of army regulations. and there was plenty of it. In these days Battalion Orderly Room would last [redacted] four or five hours every day, at the rate of one crime dealt with every three or four minutes. This was apart from the scores of less serious offences tried by company commanders. The usual Battalion Orderly Room crimes were desertion, refusing to obey an order, using obscene language to a non-commissioned officer, drunk and disorderly, robbing a comrade, and so on.

(Two years later serious crime had diminished to a twentieth of that amount though the battalion was treble its original strength; and though many of the cases that the company officers had dealt with summarily now came before the colonel; and there was practically no drunkenness.) [redacted] On pay-nights there was hardly a man sober [redacted]; and no attention was paid so long as there was silence as soon as the company officer came on his rounds just before "Lights Out."

There was a boy called Taylor in my company. He had been at Lancaster and I had bought him a piccolo to play when the detachment went out ^{on} route-marches; he would give us one tune after another for mile after mile. The other fellows carried his pack and rifle. At Wrexham on paynights he used to sit in the company-billet, which was a drill-hall near the station, and play jigs for the drunks to dance to. He never drank himself. The music was slow at first but he gradually quickened it until he [redacted] worked them [redacted] into a frenzy. He would delay this climax until my arrival with the company orderly-sergeant. The sergeant would fling open the door and bellow "F Company, Attention!"

Taylor would break off, thrust the piccolo under his blankets and spring to his feet. The drunks were left frozen in the middle of their capers, blinking stupidly.

D In the first Battalion Orderly Room that I attended there was a case that went like this :-

Sergeant Major (off stage) Now, then, you 99 Davies, F Company, cap off, as you were, cap off, as you were, cap off. That's better. Escort and prisoner right turn! Quick march. Right wheel!
(On stage) Left wheel! Mark time! Escort and prisoner halt! Left turn!

Colonel Read the charge, Sergeant Major.

Sergeant Major No. 9999 Pte. W. Davies, F. Company, at Wrexham on 20th August, improper conduct. Committing a nuisance on the barrack square. Witnesses, Sergeant Timmins, Corporal Jones.

Colonel Sergeant Timmins! Your evidence.

Sergeant Timmins Sir, on the said date about two p.m. I was hacting ~~Orderly~~ Sar'nt. Corporal Jones reported the nuisance to me. I hinspected it. It was the prisoner's, Sir.

Colonel Corporal Jones! Your evidence.

Corporal Jones Sir, on the said date I was crossing the barrack square when I saw prisoner in a sitting posture. He was committing excreta, Sir. I took his name and reported to the Orderly Sergeant, Sir!

Colonel Well, Private Davies, what have you to say for yourself?

99 Davies (in a nervous sing-song) Sir, I came over queer all of a sudden, Sir. I had the diarrhoeas terrible bad. I had to do it, Sir.

Colonel But my good man, the latrine was only a few yards away.

Davies Colonel, Sir, you can't stop nature!

Sergeant Major Don't answer an officer like that!

(Pause)

Sergeant Timmins (Coughs.) Sir?

Colonel Yes, Sergeant Timmins?

Sergeant Timmins Sir, I had occasion to hexamine the nuisance, Sir, and it was done with a heffort, Sir!

Colonel Do you take my punishment, Private Davies?

Davies Yes, Colonel, yes, Sir.

Colonel You have done a very dirty act and disgraced the regiment and your comrades. I shall make an example of you. Ten days detention!

Sergeant Major Escort and prisoner left turn! Quick (off stage) march. Left wheel.
Escort and prisoner halt! Cap on! Get ready the next case!

There must have been a dozen officers at least in the Orderly Room at the time and not one of them smiled.

Orderly Room always ^{embarrassed and dispirited me.} I never got used to it even after sentencing thousands of men myself. There was something shameful about it. The only change that the introduction of the civilian element into the army brought was that about half-way through the war an army order came out that henceforth the word of command was to be "accused and escort, right turn, quick march, etc.," instead of "prisoner and escort, right turn, quick march, etc." It was only very seldom that ^{an interesting} case came up.
 ^{Even} The obscene language, always quoted verbatim, was drearily the same; the only variation I remember from the four stock words was in the case of a man charged with using threatening and obscene language to an N.C.O. The man had, it appeared, said to a lance-corporal who had a down on him, "Corporal Smith, two men shall meet before two mountains." ^{Humour} only came from the very Welsh "Welshmen from the hills" who had an imperfect command of English. One of them charged with being absent off ceremonial parade and using obscene language to the sergeant became very indignant in Orderly Room and cried out to the Colonel: "Colonel, sir, Sergeant tole me wass I for guard, I axed him no, and now the bloody bastard says wass I."

The ^{greatest number of simultaneous charges that I ever heard preferred against} a soldier was in the case of Boy Jones at Liverpool in 1917. He was charged with, first, File, with being found in possession of regimental property of the Cheshire Regiment.

using obscene language to the bandmaster; the bandmaster, who was squeamish, reported it as: "Sir, he called me a double effing C." Next, with breaking out of the detention that was awarded for this crime. Thirdly, with "absenting himself from the regiment until apprehended in the Hindenburg Line, France." Fourthly, with resisting an escort. Boy Jones, who was only fourteen and looked thirteen, had wriggled through the bars of the detention-cell and, after getting a few things together at his hut, had gone to Liverpool Exchange Station to wait for a victim. The victim was a private in the Bantam battalion just returning to France on leave. He treated the bantam to a lot of drink and robbed him of his rifle, equipment, badges and papers. He then went off in his place. Arrived in France he was posted to the Bantam battalion; but this did not suit him. He wanted to be with his own regiment. He deserted the Bantams who were ^{somewhere north of} Arras and walked south along the trenches looking for his regiment, having now assumed his proper badges. After a couple of days' walk he found the Second Battalion and reported. And was immediately sent ~~home~~ ^{home}, though he had a struggle with the escort at the Railhead. The punishment for all these offences was ~~ten days confined to camp~~ and a spanking from the bandmaster.

101

The most unusual charge was against the Regimental Goat-major (a corporal): it was first framed as 'lèse-majesté', but this was later reduced to 'Disrespect to an Officer: in that he at Wrexham - on such and such a date - did prostitute the Royal Goat, being the gift of His Majesty the Colonel-in-Chief from His Royal herd at Windsor, by offering his stud-services to _____ Esq, farmer and goat breeder, of Wrexham.' The goat-major pleaded that he had done this because he was sorry for the goat, to which he was much attached. He was reduced to the ranks and the charge of the goat given to another.

though ~~the~~ the regular battalions of the regiment, did not normally contain more than about one Welshman in fifty. ^{in the ranks} They were mainly recruited in Birmingham. The only Welshman at Harlech besides myself who had joined the Army at the start was a poor boy, a golf-caddy, who had got into trouble a short time before for shop-lifting. The chapels held soldiering to be sinful and in Merioneth the chapels were supreme. ~~The boys~~ Prayers were offered for me in the chapels, not because of the dangers

I ran in the war, but because I was in the army. Later, Lloyd George persuaded the chapels that the war was a Crusade in which every good Christian should join. So there was a sudden tremendous influx of Welshmen from North Wales. They were difficult soldiers; ^{they particularly resented having} ~~they were particularly difficult~~ to stand still while the N.C.O's swore at them. A deputation of ^{North} Welshmen ~~from round Harlech~~ came to me once and said: "Captain Graves, sir, we do not like our Sergeant Major, he do curse, and he do swear, and he do drink, and he is a ^{man} ~~man~~ of lowly origin, too." ~~They were particularly difficult~~

At Wrexham we learned regimental history, drill, musketry, Boer War field-tactics, military law and organization, how to recognise bugle calls, how to work a machine-gun, and how to conduct ourselves as officers on formal occasions. We dug no trenches, handled no bombs, and were taught to think of the company, and not of the platoon, still less of the section, as the smallest independent tactical unit. There were only two wounded officers back from the front at the time: both had left the Second Battalion on the retreat from Mons. Neither would talk much of his experiences. All that one of them, "Emu Jones," would ^{tell us} ~~say~~ was: "The first queer sight I saw in France was three naked women hanging by their feet in a butcher's shop." The other would say: "The shells knock hell out of a man, especially the big black ones. Just hell. And that fellow Emu; he wasn't any good. We marched and marched and he had a weak heart and used to faint and expect his poor bloody platoon to carry him as well as the rest of their load. We used to swear he was shamming. Don't believe what old Emu tells you of the Retreat."

CHAPTER X.

I will try to recall my war-time feelings about the ~~regiment~~ ^{Royal Welch Fusiliers} ~~regiment~~ ^{once was}. I used to ~~think~~ ^{contemplate myself on having} ~~chosen~~ ^{this of all regiments,} quite blindly ~~to join~~ ^{chosen} a regiment ~~which~~ ^{was} ~~was~~ ^{justified}. "Good God!" I used to think, "suppose that when the war broke out I had been living ~~in~~ ⁱⁿ Cheshire and had applied for a commission in the Cheshire regiment." I thought ~~it would~~ ^{how ashamed I should} have been to find in the history of that regiment (which was the old Twenty-Second Foot, just senior in the Line to the Royal Welch, which was the Twenty-Third,) that ~~it~~ ^{had been deprived of the title} ~~of~~ ^{The Royal Cheshires} ~~but that~~ ^{it} ~~was~~ ^{removed} as a punishment for ~~losing a battle~~ ^{losing a battle} ~~in~~ ^{the field}. Or how lucky not to have joined the Bedfords. Though the Bedfords had made a name for themselves in this war, they were still ^{called} "The Peacemakers." For they only had four battle-honours on their colours and none of these more recent than the year 1711; ^{it was a sneer that} their regimental motto was ~~was~~ "Thou shalt not kill." Even the Black Watch, the best of the Highland regiments, had a stain on its ^{record} ~~colours~~; and everyone knew about it. If a Tommy of another regiment went into a public bar where men of the Black Watch were drinking and felt brave enough to start a fight he would ask the barmaid ~~not~~ ^{not} for "pig's ear", which is rhyming-slang for beer, but for "a pint of broken square." Then belts would be unbuckled.

The Royal Welch record was beyond reproach. There were twenty-nine battle-honours on its colours, a number only equalled by two other two-battalion regiments. And the Royal Welch had the advantage of ^{these since they} ~~them~~ ^{these} were not single regiments but recent combinations of two regiments each with its separate history. The first Battalion of the Royal Welch Fusiliers had twenty-six battle-honours of its own, the remaining three having been won by the second Battalion in its short and interrupted existence. They were all good bloody battle-honours none ^{of them} like that battle of the Argyll and Sutherland Highlanders into which, it was said, ^{they} ~~the regiment~~ had gone with nine hundred men and from which ^{they} ~~it~~ had come out with nine hundred and one, ~~no~~ casualties, ^{and} ~~and~~ a band-boy ^{come} ~~of~~ age and ~~promoted~~ promoted a private. For many hard battles such as the Boyne and Aughrim and the capture of Lille the Royal Welch had never been honoured. The regiment had fought in each of the four hardest fought victories of the British army, as listed by Sir John Fortescue. My regimental history is rusty but I believe ^{that} they were The Boyne, Malplaquet, Albuhera and Inkerman. That is three out of four. It may have been Salamanca or Waterloo instead of The Boyne. It was also one of the six Minden regiments and one of the front-line regiments at that. They performed the unprecedented feat of charging a body of cavalry many times their own strength and driving it off the field. The surrender at York Town in the American War of Independence was the regiment's single disaster, but even that was not a disgrace. It was accorded the full honours of war. Its conduct in the hard fighting at Lexington, at Guildford Court House ^{and} in its suicidal advance up Bunker's Hill, had earned it ^{them} .

I caught the sense of regimental tradition a day or two after I arrived at the Depot. In a cupboard in the junior ante-room at the Mess I came across a big leather-bound ledger and pulled it out to see what it was about. It was the Daily Order Book of the ^{First Battalion} in the trenches before Sebastopol, I ~~had~~ opened it at the page giving orders for the attack on the Redan Fort. Such-and-such a company was desired to supply volunteers for the storming party under Lieutenant So-and-so. There followed details of their arms and equipment, the number of ladders they were to carry and the support to be afforded by other companies. Then details of rations ^{and} supply of ammunition ~~and~~, with an earnest God's Speed from the commanding officer. (A sketch of the commanding officer was on the wall above my head, lying sick in his tent at Scutari, wearing a ^{cap-comforter} Balaclava helmet for the cold.) And the next entry ^{ies were about} ~~clearing up~~ ~~wreck~~ after an unsuccessful attack, orders for the burial of the dead, thanks from Headquarters for the gallantry vainly displayed, and a notice that the effects of the late Lieutenant So-and-so, who had led the storming party, would be sold ~~at~~ at public auction in the trenches next day. In another day's Orders was the notice of the Victoria Cross awarded to Sergeant Luke O'Connor. He had lived to be Lieutenant-General Sir Luke O'Connor and was now Colonel of the regiment.

The most ^{immediate} ~~piece~~ piece of regimental history that I met as a recruit officer was the flash. The flash is a fan-like bunch of five black ribbons, each ribbon two inches wide and seven and a half inches long; the angle at which ^{the} fan is spread is exactly regulated by regimental convention. It is stitched to the back of the tunic collar. Only the Royal Welch are privileged to wear it. The story is that the Royal Welch were abroad on foreign service for several years in the 1830's and by some chance never received the army order abolishing the queue. When the regiment returned and paraded at Plymouth the inspecting general rated the commanding officer because his men were still wearing their hair in the old fashion. The commanding officer, angry with the slight, immediately rode up to London and won from King William IV, through the intercession of some court official, the regimental privilege of continuing to wear the ~~flash, which was the~~ bunch of ribbons in which the end of the queue was tied^{the flash}. It was to be a distinctive badge worn by all ranks in reward for the regiment's exemplary services in the Napoleonic Wars.

The Army Council, which is usually composed of cavalry, engineer and artillery generals, with the infantry hardly represented, had never encouraged regimental peculiarities and perhaps could not easily forget the irregularity of the colonel's direct appeal to the Sovereign in the matter of the flash. The flash was, at any rate, not sanctioned by the Army Council on the new khaki service dress. None the less, the officers and warrant-officers continued to wear it. There was a correspondence, I was told, in the early stages of the ~~war~~ war between the regiment and the Army Council. The regiment maintained that since the flash was a distinctive mark won in war it should be worn with service dress and not merely with peace-time scarlet. The Army Council put forward the objection that it was a distinctive mark for ~~enemies' snipers~~^{enemy marksmen} and particularly dangerous when worn only by officers. The regiment retorted by enquiring on what occasion since the retreat from Corunna, when the regiment was the last to leave Spain with the key of the town postern in the pocket of one of its officers, had any of His Majesty's enemies seen the back of a ^{Royal Welch} Fusilier? The Army Council was firm, but the regiment was obstinate and the matter was in abeyance throughout the war. Once in 1917, when an officer of my company went to Buckingham Palace to be decorated with the Military Cross, the King, as Colonel-in-Chief of the regiment, showed a personal interest in the matter. He asked "You are serving in one of the line battalions?" "The Second Battalion, Your Majesty." So the King gave him the order "About turn" and looked at the flash and then "About turn" again. "Good," he said, "You're still wearing it, I see," and then in a stage-whisper "Don't ever let ^{anyone} ~~them~~ take it from you." The regiment was delighted. After the war, when scarlet was abandoned on the grounds of expense, the Army Council saw that it could ^{reasonably} ~~with~~ sanction the flash on service dress for all ranks. As an additional favour it consented to recognise another defiant regimental peculiarity, the spelling of the word "Welch" with a "c". The permission was published in a special army order in 1919. ^{The Daily Herald} ~~commented~~ commented "Strewth!" as if it were unimportant. That was ignorance. The spelling with a "c" was as important to us as the miniature cap-badge worn at the back of the cap was to the Gloucesters (a commemoration of the time when they fought back to back; was it at ^{the} ~~Quaker~~ Bras?) I have seen a young officer sent off battalion parade because his buttons read "Welsh" instead of "Welch." "Welch" referred us somehow to the antique ^{North} Wales of Henry Tudor and Owen Glendower and Lord Herbert of Cherbury, the founder of the regiment; it dissociated us from the modern ^{North Wales} ~~of~~ of chapels, liberalism, the dairy and drapery businesses, Lloyd George and the tourist trade.

The ^{regiment} Regiment was extremely strict on the standard measurements of the flash. When new-army battalions were formed and rumours came to Wrexham that in, I think, the 18th Battalion the officers were wearing flashes nearly down to their waists there was great consternation. The adjutant sent off the youngest subaltern on a special mission to the camp of the 18th Battalion, He was to present himself at the battalion Orderly Room with a large pair of shears. ~~the~~ colonel of ^{which} ~~the~~ was not a Royal Welch Fusilier, but a loan from one of the Yorkshire regiments. ~~He~~ cut down the flashes of your subaltern officers to regimental length." The new army battalions were as anxious to be regimental as the line battalions. ^{It once} ~~One old incident~~ happened in France ^{that a} ~~_____~~ of the Royal Fusiliers entered the mess of the 19th (Bantam) battalion of the Royal Welch Fusiliers. He greeted the mess with "Good afternoon, gentlemen," and called for a drink from the mess sergeant. After he had talked for a bit he asked the senior officer present: "Do you know why I ordered that drink from the mess sergeant?" and The Welch Fusilier said, "Yes, you wanted to see if we remembered about Albuhera." The Royal Fusilier ^{answered:} ~~_____~~ ~~that he had, and said~~ "Well, our mess is just along behind that wood there. We haven't forgotten either." ~~_____~~

~~for, "I have been sent from the Depot, sir, to~~

~~_____~~ After Albuhera the few survivors of the Royal Welch Fusiliers and the Royal Fusiliers had messed together on the captured hill. It was then decided that henceforth and for ever the officers of each regiment were honorary members of the other's mess, and the N.C.O's the same.

Perhaps the most ^{legendary item} ~~_____~~ was ~~_____~~ Thomas Atkins. ^{He} ~~_____~~ was a private soldier in the ^{who had served under Wellington} First Battalion in the Peninsular War. It is said that ^{when} many years later Wellington at the War Office was asked to approve a specimen form for military attestation, ^{he had ordered it to be amended from} ~~_____~~ that ~~_____~~ the form as it stood, "I, Private John Doe of the Blank regiment, do hereby, etc.," ~~_____~~ ~~it to be amended to~~ "I, Private Thomas Atkins, of the ^{do hereby,} Twenty-Third Foot, etc." ~~_____~~ ~~_____~~ ~~_____~~ ~~_____~~ ~~_____~~ and who ~~and who had~~ ^{And now I am going to spoil the story} because I ^{cannot} ~~_____~~ for the life of me remember what ^{British Grenadierish conduct} it was that ~~_____~~ ~~_____~~ ^{remember-} ~~_____~~ made Wellington ~~_____~~ ~~_____~~ ~~_____~~ ~~_____~~ ~~_____~~ at least it was something.

~~British Grenadiers, something tough and yet noble,~~ ~~stupid British to remember the details has interrupted my~~ very creditable (after eleven years) lyrical passage. ^{And here so here ends} P I was going on to St. David's Night. To the leeks eaten to the roll of the drum with one foot on the chair and one on the mess-table enriched with spoils of the Summer Palace at Peking.
 (They are not at all bad to eat, despite Shakespeare)
 And to the Royal Goat with gilded horns that once leapt over this mess table with the drummer boy on its back. And Major Toby Purcell's Golden Spurs. And Shenkin Ap Morgan the First Gentleman of Wales.

~~Let me mention the~~
~~the role of the British Grenadiers~~ ^{And} ^{The regimental march-past.} ~~mean as~~ ~~was~~ ~~the~~
~~to~~
~~and their regimental march-past.~~ I was going to explain that The British Grenadiers

 does not mean, as most people think, merely the Grenadier Guards. It includes all regiments, the Royal Welch Fusiliers which wear a bushy grenade as a collar & cap badge to recall their early employment as storm-troop armed with bombs.

~~regimental esprit-de-corp~~
~~of the Royal Welch Fusiliers grew too big~~ ^{In the war} ^{(; this I am glad} Before the war there were the two line battalions and the Depot; the affiliated and flash-less Territorials, four battalions ^{in spite of their regular adjutants. The} recruited for home service, could be disregarded. ~~But~~ ^{Third Battalion, which trained at the Depot, was a poor relation. Now} ^{new-army}
~~the~~ more and more battalions were added ^{even a} ^{Twenty-Fifth} ~~battalion~~ was on service in 1917, and was as good a battalion as the Eighth).

~~So the regiment~~ ^{line-} (that is, consensus of opinion in the two ~~line-~~ battalions) only tentatively accepted the new-army battalions one by one as they proved themselves worthy by service in the field. The Territorials it never accepted, disowning them contemptuously as "dog-shooters."
 The fact ^{was} that three of the four Territorial battalions failed signally in the Suvla Bay landing at Gallipoli. One battalion, it was known, had offered violence to its officers;
 the Commanding Officer, a regular, had not cared to survive that day. Even the good work that these battalions did later in Palestine could not cancel this disgrace. The remaining Territorial battalion was attached to the First Division in France early in 1915, where at Givenchy it quite unnecessarily lost its machine-guns. Regimental machine-guns in 1915 were ^{before} regarded almost as sacred. To lose one's machine-guns ~~was~~ the annihilation of the entire battalion was considered as bad as losing the ~~regimental colours~~ regimental colours ^{would have been} ~~in any eighteenth~~ or nineteenth century battle. The machine-gun officer had congratulated himself on removing the machine-gun bolts before abandoning the guns; it would make them useless to the enemy.

But he had forgotten to take away the boxes of spare-parts.
The ~~Second~~ ^{made} battalion ~~made~~ a raid in the same sector a year and a half later and recaptured one of the guns, which had been busy against the British trenches ever since.

As soon as we arrived at the Depot we ~~Special Reserve~~ officers were reminded of our great good fortune. We were to have the privilege of serving with one or ^{the} other of the line battalions. In peace-time a candidate for a commission in the regiment had not only to distinguish himself in the passing-out examination at the Royal Military College, Sandhurst, and be strongly recommended by two officers of the regiment, but he had to have a guaranteed independent income that enabled him to play polo and hunt and keep up the social reputation of the regiment. ~~These requirements were not insisted on; but~~ we were to understand that we did not belong to ~~the regiment~~ in the special sense, ~~but~~ ^{To} be allowed to serve with it in time of war should satisfy our ambitions. We were not ~~temporary~~ officers like those of the new-army but held permanent commissions in the Special Reserve battalion.
We were reminded that the Royal Welch considered themselves second to none, even to the Guards. Representations had been made to the regiment after the South African war enquiring whether it was willing to become The ^SWelsh Guards, and it had indignantly refused; such a change would have ^{made} ~~the~~ regiment junior in the Brigade of Guards even to the Irish Guards only so recently formed. We were warned that while serving with a line ~~battalion~~ we were none of us to expect to be recommended for orders or decorations. An ordinary campaigning medal inscribed with a record of service with the battalion should be sufficient reward. Decorations were not regarded in the regiment as personal awards but as representative awards for the whole battalion. They would be therefore reserved for the professional soldiers to whom they would be more useful than to us as helps to extra-regimental promotion. And ^{this} was what happened. There must have been something like two or three hundred Special Reserve officers serving overseas. ^{But} except for three or four who distinguished themselves while attached to ^{brigade or} divisional staffs

~~and~~ were not directly recommended by the battalion commander ^{but} or those who happened to be sent to new-army battalions ^{or other regiments} we remained undecorated. I can only recall three exceptions.

The normal proportion of awards, considering the casualties we suffered, which was about sixty or seventy killed, should have been at least ten times that amount. ~~The~~

~~at Sandhurst~~

~~I~~ ^I ^{never} myself performed any feat for which I might conceivably have been decorated throughout my service in France.

^{In the trenches} Regimental pride, ~~so far from being an empty thing,~~ ^{was a stronger} found by far the greatest moral force ^{than} ~~in the~~ ^{either} ~~of~~ patriotism ^{or} religion. ~~and~~

^{It was} ~~Divisional~~ pride supplemented ^{by Divisional} ~~regimental~~ pride, particularly when the divisions were ~~formed~~ ^{formed} ~~according to some~~ geographically ~~Eastern~~ - Eastern Counties, Lowland, London, Ulster and so on.

~~The~~ continuity of the regimental spirit survived ~~persistently~~ ^{all} catastrophes.

Our First Battalion, for instance, was annihilated within two months of joining the British Expeditionary Force.

Young Orme, who joined straight from Sandhurst, at the crisis of the first battle of Ypres, found himself commanding a battalion reduced to only about sixty rifles. With these and another small force, the remnants of the ^{Second Battalion of the} 2nd Queen's regiment, he recaptured three lines of lost trenches and was himself killed. The re-constituted battalion, after heavy fighting at Bois Gren^{ier} in December, was again all but annihilated at the Aubers Ridge and Festubert in the following May; and again at Loos in September, when the one officer-survivor of the attack was a machine-gun officer loaned from the South Staffordshire regiment. The same sort of thing happened time after time, in fighting at Fricourt, the Quadrangle, High Wood, Delville Wood and ^{Grinchy} on the Somme ^{in 1916} and again at Puy^{ieux} and Bullecourt in the Spring fighting of 1917. In the course of the war at least fifteen or twenty thousand men must have passed through each of the two line-battalions, whose fighting strength was never more than eight hundred. The continuity was ^{maintained by} the proportion of ^{the} lightly wounded to the killed and permanently disabled. After each catastrophe the ranks were filled up with new drafts from home, with the lightly wounded from the previous disaster returning after three or four months absence, and with the more seriously wounded returning after nine months or a year. The wastage could go on indefinitely so long as the new drafts were good material.

In the First and Second battalions throughout the war it was not merely the officers and non-commissioned officers who knew their regimental history. The men knew far more about Minden and Albuhera and Waterloo than they did about the fighting on the other fronts or the official causes of the war. Regimental history and arms drill were the twin buttresses of our morale; our arms drill was really good.

CHAPTER XI.

In 1916 when on leave in England after being wounded on the Somme I began an account of my first few months in France. Unfortunately I wrote it as a novel and I have now to retranslate it into history. I will give one reconstituted chapter :-

On arrival in France we six Royal Welch officers went to the Harfleur base-camp near Havre. ~~It was to become~~ an educational centre for trench-routine, use of bombs, trench-mortars, rifle-grenades, gas-helmets, and similar technicalities. ~~It~~ ^{But now we} did a route-march or two through the French countryside ~~and~~ ^{and} that was all, except for fatigues in Havre at the Docks, helping the Army Service Corps unload stores from ships. The town was gay ~~and welcomed us confidently~~. As soon as we had arrived we were accosted by numerous little boys ~~of the town~~, ~~and~~ pimping for their sisters. "I take you to my sister. She very nice. Very good jig-a-jig. Not much money. Very cheap. Very good. I take you now. Plenty champagne for me?" We were glad when we got orders to go "up the line." But disgusted to find ourselves attached not to the Royal Welch Fusiliers but to the Welsh Regiment.

We had heard little about the Welsh Regiment except that it was tough but rough and that the Second Battalion to which we were now attached had a peculiar regimental history as the old 69th Foot. It had originally been formed as an emergency force from pensioners and ^{boy-}recruits and sent overseas to do the work of a regular battalion - I forget in which eighteenth-century campaign. At one time it had served as marines. The "Ups and Downs" was the battalion's army nick-name, partly because 69 is a number which makes the same sense whichever way up it is written. The 69 was certainly upside-down when we joined it. All the company officers except two boys recently from Sandhurst and a Special Reserve captain were attached from other regiments. There were now six Royal Welch Fusiliers, two South Wales Borderers, two East Surreys, two Wiltshires, one from the Border regiment, one from the King's Own Yorkshire Light Infantry. Even the quartermaster was an alien from the Connaught Rangers. There were not more than four time-serving N.C.O's left in the battalion. Of the men not more than fifty or so had ~~been~~ ^{been given} more than a couple of months' training before being sent out; some had ~~had~~ only three weeks' training, a great many had never fired a musketry course. This was because the First Division had been in constant hard fighting since the previous August; the Second Welsh had in eight months lost its full fighting strength five times over. The last occasion was the Richebourg fighting of May 9th, one of the worst disasters of the early part of the war; the division's epitaph in the official communique ~~was that~~ ^{read:} "Meeting with considerable opposition in the direction of the Rue du Bois, our attacks were not pressed."

The Welsh ranks had been made up first with reservists of the later categories, then with re-enlisted men, then with special reservists of pre-war enlistment, then with 1914 recruits of three or four months training; but each class had in turn been exhausted. Now nothing was left to send but recruits of the Spring 1915 class and ~~all sorts~~ ^{various} of sweepings and scourings. The ~~First~~ ^{First} Battalion had meanwhile had the same heavy losses. In Cardiff they advertised "Enlist at the Depot and get to France quick." The recruits were principally men either over-age or under-age - a repetition of regimental history - or men who had some slight physical disability which prevented them from enlisting in regiments ~~more~~ ^{more} particular than the Welsh. I still have the roll of my first platoon of forty men. The figures given for their ages are misleading. When they enlisted all the over-age men had put themselves in the late thirties and all the under-age men had called themselves eighteen. But, once in France, the over-age men did not mind adding on a few genuine years. No less than fourteen in the roll give their age as forty or over and ~~these~~ ^{these} were not all. Fred Prosser, a painter in civil life, who admitted to forty-eight was really fifty-six. David Davis, collier, who admitted to forty-two and Thomas Clark, another collier, who admitted to forty-five, were only one ~~or two~~ ^{years} junior to Prosser. ~~None of these men however~~ ~~claim to be the eldest in the platoon, but~~ ~~James Burford, collier and fitter,~~ ^(was even older than these)

When I first spoke to him in the trenches he said, "Excuse me, sir, will you explain what this here arrangement is on the side of my rifle?" "That's the safety-catch. Didn't you do a musketry course at the Depot?" "No, sir, I was a re-enlisted man and I only had a fortnight there. The old Lee-Metford didn't have no safety-catch." I asked him when he had last fired a rifle. "In Egypt ~~in 1882~~ ^{that year ago in 1882}" he said. "Weren't you in the South African war?" "I tried to re-enlist but they told me I was too old, sir. ^{I had been an old soldier when I was in Egypt.} My real age is sixty-three." He spent all his summers as a tramp and in the bad months of the year worked as a collier, choosing a new pit every season. I heard him and David Davis one night in a dug-out opposite mine talking about the different seams of coal in Wales and tracing them from county to county and pit to pit with technical comments. It was one of the most informative conversations I ever heard.

The other half of the platoon contained the under-age section. There were five of these boys; William Bumford, collier, for instance, who gave his age as eighteen was really only fifteen. He used to get into trouble for falling asleep on sentry duty. The official penalty for this ~~should have been~~ ^{was} death, but I had observed that he ~~simply~~ could not help it. I had seen him suddenly go to sleep, on his feet, while holding a sand-bag open for another fellow to fill. So we got him a job as orderly to a chaplain for awhile, and a few months later all men over fifty and all boys under eighteen were combed out and sent to the base. Bumford and Burford were both sent; but neither escaped the war. Bumford was old enough to be sent back to the battalion in the later stages of the war, and was killed; ~~and~~ Burford was killed ^{too} in a bombing accident at the base-camp; or so I was told. The fates of many of my comrades in France have come to me merely as ~~the fates of many of my comrades in France have come to me merely as~~ Hearsay.

~~_____~~
~~_____~~
~~_____~~

↑ ↑
It took us twenty-five hours in the troop train to arrive at Bethune, the rail-head. It was about nine o'clock in the evening and we were hungry, cold and dirty. We had expected a short journey and so allowed our baggage to be put in a locked van. We ~~had~~ played Nap to keep our minds off the discomfort and I ~~had~~ lost sixty francs, which was over → two pounds at the existing rate of exchange. On the platform at Béthune a little man in filthy khaki wearing the Welsh cap-badge came up with a friendly touch of the cap most unlike a salute. He was to be our guide to the battalion, which was in the Cambrin trenches about ten kilometres away. He asked us to collect the draft of forty men we had with us and follow him. We marched through the unlit suburbs of the town. We were all intensely excited at the noise and flashes of the guns in the distance. The men of the draft had none of them been out before, except the sergeant in charge. They began singing. Instead of the usual music-hall songs they sang Welsh hymns, each man taking a part. The Welsh always sang when they were ^{a bit} frightened ~~that~~ that they were not; it kept them steady. They never sang out of tune.

We marched towards the flashes and (soon could) see the flare-lights curving over the trenches in the distance. The noise of the guns grew louder and louder. Then we were among the batteries. From behind us on the left of the road a salvo of four shells came suddenly over our heads. The battery was only about two hundred yards away. This broke up "Aberystwyth" in the middle of a verse and set us off our balance for a few seconds; the column of fours tangled up. The shells went hissing away eastward; we could see the red flash and heard the hollow bang where they landed in German territory. The men picked up their step again and began chaffing. A lance-corporal dictated a letter home: "Dear Auntie, this leaves me in the pink. We are at present wading in blood up to our necks. Send me fags and a life-belt. This was is a booger. Love and kisses."

The roadside cottages were now showing more and more signs of dilapidation. A German shell came over and then whoo - oo - oo ooooo bump CRASH! twenty yards away from the party. We threw ourselves flat on our faces. Presently we heard a curious singing noise in the air and then flop! flop! little pieces of shell-casing came buzzing down all around. "They calls them the musical instruments," said the sergeant. "Damn them," said ^{Frank} Jones-Bateman, who had a cut in his hand from a jagged little piece, "the devils have started on me early." "Aye, they'll have a lot of fun with you before they're done, sir," grinned the sergeant. Another shell came over. Everyone threw himself down again but it burst two hundred yards behind us. Only Sergeant Jones had remained on his feet and laughed at us. "You're wasting yourselves, lads," he said to the draft. "Listen by the noise they make coming where they're going to burst."

At Cambrin village which was about half-a-mile from the trenches we were taken into a ruined house. It had been a chemist's shop and the coloured glass lights were still in the window. It was the billet of the Welsh company-quartermaster-sergeants. Here we were issued with gas-respirators and field dressings. This was the first respirator issued in France. It was a gauze-pad filled with chemically treated cotton waste, to be tied across the mouth and nose. It seems it was useless against German gas. I never put it to the test. A week or two later came the 'smoke-helmet,' ~~as it was called,~~ a greasy grey-felt bag, with a talc window to look through, but no mouth-piece. This also was probably ~~quite~~ ineffective against gas. The talc was always cracking and there were leaks where it was stitched into the helmet.

These were early days of trench-warfare, the days of the jam-tin bomb and the gas-pipe trench-mortar. It was before Lewis guns and steel helmets, telescopic rifle-sights, gas-shells, pill-boxes, tanks, trench-raids, or any of the later improvements of trench-warfare.

After a meal of bread, bacon, rum and bitter stewed tea, sickly with sugar, we went up through the broken trees to the east of the village and up a long trench to battalion headquarters. The trench was cut through red clay. I had a torch with me which I kept flashed on the ground. Hundreds of field mice and frogs were in the trench. They had fallen in and had no way out. The light dazzled them and we couldn't ^{not} help treading on them. So I put the torch back in my pocket. We had ~~no~~ no picture of what the trenches were going to be like, and were not far off the state of mind in which one young soldier joined us a week or two later. He called out very excitedly to old Barford who was cooking up a bit of stew in a dixie, apart from the others. "Hi, mate, where's the battle? I want to do my bit."

The trench was wet and slippery. The guide was giving hoarse directions all the time. "Hole right." "Wire high." "Wire low." "Deep place here, sir." "Wire low." I had never been told about the field telephone wires. They were fastened by staples to the side of the trench and when it rained the staples were always falling out and the wire falling down and tripping people up. If it sagged too much one stretched it across the top of the trench to the other side to correct the sag, and then it would catch one's head. The holes were the sump-pits used for draining the trenches.

We were now under rifle-fire. I always found rifle-fire more trying than shell-fire. The gunner was usually, I knew, firing not at people but at map-references - cross-roads, likely artillery positions, houses that suggested billets for troops, and so on. Even when an observation officer in an aeroplane or captive balloon or on a church spire was directing the firing it seemed unaimed, somehow. But a rifle bullet even when fired blindly always had the effect of seeming aimed. And we could hear a shell coming and take some sort of cover, but the rifle bullet gave no warning. So though we learned not to duck to a rifle bullet because once it was heard it must have missed, it gave us a worse feeling. ^{of danger} Rifle bullets in the open went hissing into the grass without much noise but when we were in a trench the bullets, going over the hollow, made a tremendous crack. Bullets often struck the barbed wire in front of the trenches, which turned them and sent them spinning in a head-over-heels motion ~~with a tremendous noise~~ ~~I can remember the sound as I heard at Cambrai~~ going ping! rockety - ockety-ockety-ockety into the woods behind.

Battalion headquarters was a dug-out in the reserve line about a quarter of a mile from the front companies. The colonel, a twice wounded regular, shook hands with us and offered us the whisky bottle. He said that we were welcome and hoped that we would soon grow to like the regiment as much as our own. It was a ^{cosy dug-out} comfortable place for so early a stage of trench-warfare. (This sector had only recently been taken over from the French, who knew how to make themselves comfortable. It had been a ~~French~~ territorial division, of men in the forties. ^{who} They had had a local armistice with the Germans opposite; there ^{was} had been no firing and apparently even ^{civilian} traffic through the lines.) There was an ornamental lamp, a clean cloth and polished silver on the table, where the colonel, adjutant, doctor, second-in-command and signalling officer were ^{at} having dinner. ^{It was civilized cooking with fresh meat and vegetables.} Pictures were pasted on the walls, there were beds with spring mattresses, a gramophone, easy chairs. It was hard to reconcile this with accounts I had read of troops standing waist-deep in mud and gnawing a biscuit while shells burst all around. We were posted to our companies. I went to C. company, "Captain Dunn is your company commander," said the adjutant, "the soundest officer in the battalion. By the way, remind him that I want that list of D.C.M. recommendations for the last show sent in at once, but not more than two names or else they won't give us any. Four is about the ration for the battalion in a dud show."

Our guide took us up to the front line. We passed a group of men huddled over ^a braziers. They were wearing waterproof ground-sheets as capes, for it had now started to rain, and cap-comforters because the weather was cold. They were little men, daubed with mud, and they were talking quietly together in Welsh. Although they could see we were officers they did not jump to their feet and salute. I thought that this was a convention of the trenches and indeed I knew that it was laid down somewhere in the military text-books that the courtesy of the salute was to be dispensed with in battle. But I was wrong; it was just slackness. We overtook a fatigue party struggling up the trench loaded with timber lengths ~~and bundles of sandbags~~ and bundles of sandbags, cursing plaintively as they slipped into sump-holes and entangled their burdens in the telephone wire. Fatigue parties were always encumbered by their rifles and equipment, which it was a crime ever to have out of reach. When we had squeezed past this ^{party} ~~set~~ we had to stand aside to let a stretcher-case past. "Who's the poor bastard, Dai?" the guide asked the leading stretcher-bearer. "Sergeant Gallagher," Dai answered, "He thought he saw a Fritz in No Man's Land near our wire, so the silly b-g-r takes one of them new issue percussion-bombs and shots it at 'im. Silly b-g-r aims too low, it hits the top of the parapet and bursts back. Deoul! man, it breaks his silly f-k-ing jaw and blows a great lump from his silly f-k-ing face, whatever. Poor silly b-g-r! Not worth sweating to get him back! He's put paid to, whatever." The wounded man had a sand-bag over his face. He was dead when they got him back to the dressing-station. I was tired out by the time I got to company headquarters. I was carrying a pack-valise like the men, and my belt was hung with all the usual furnishings, ^{my} revolver, field glasses, compass, whisky flask, wire cutters, periscope and a lot more. A Christmas-tree that was called. (These were the days in which officers ~~actually~~ went out to France with swords and ~~we~~ had them sharpened by the armourer before sailing. But ^I ~~we~~ had been advised to leave ~~our~~ ^{my} sword^s back in the billet where we had ~~tea~~ tea. I never saw ~~mine~~ again or bothered about it.) I was hot and sweaty, my hands were sticky with the clay from the side of the trench. C. Company Headquarters was a two-roomed timber-built shelter in the side of a trench connecting the front and support lines. Here were table-cloth and lamp again, whisky bottle and glasses, shelves with books and magazines, a framed picture of General Joffre, a large mirror, and bunks in the next room. I reported to the company commander.

I had expected him to be a middle-aged man with a breast-full of medals with whom I would have to be ~~be~~ formal; but Dunn was actually two months younger than myself. He was one of the fellowship of "only survivors" (Captain Miller of the Black Watch in the same division was another. Miller had only escaped from the Rue du Bois massacre by swimming down a flooded trench. He has carried on his surviving trade ever since.* Only survivors have great reputations. Miller used to be pointed at in the streets when the battalion was back in reserve billets. "See that fellow. That's Jock Miller. Out from the start and ^{hasn't} got ^{it yet}."*) Dunn had not let the war affect his morale at all. He greeted me very easily with, "Well, what's the news from England? Oh sorry, first I must introduce you. This is Walker, clever chap, comes from Cambridge and fancies himself as an ^{athlete}. This is Jenkins, one of those patriotic chaps who chucked up his job to come here. This is Price who only joined us yesterday, but we like him, he brought some damn good whisky with him. Well, how long is the war going to last and who's winning? We don't know a thing out here. And what's all this talk about war-babies? Price pretends he knows nothing about them." I told them about the war and asked them about the trenches.

"About trenches," said Dunn, "well, we don't know as much about trenches as the French do and not near as much as Fritz does. We can't expect Fritz to help but the French might do something. They are greedy; they won't let us have the benefit of their inventions. What wouldn't we give for their parachute lights and their aerial torpedoes! ~~things~~! But there's no connection between the two armies except when there's a battle on, and then we generally let each other down.

"When I was out here first all that we did in the

* I do not know what happened to Miller
This was written in the summer of 1916.

trenches was to paddle about in water and use our rifles. We didn't think of them as places to live in, they were just temporary inconveniences. Now we work all the time we are here, not only for safety but for health. Night and day. First, the fire-steps, ~~then the~~ then building traverses, improving the communication trenches, and so on, lastly on our personal comfort, shelters and dug-outs. There was a territorial battalion that used to relieve us. They were hopeless. They used to sit down in the trench and say 'Oh my God, this is the limit.' They'd pull out pencil and paper and write home about it. Did no work on the ~~traverses~~ ^{traverses} or on fire positions. Consequence - they lost half their men from frost-bite and rheumatism, and one day the Germans broke in and ~~scattered~~ ^{scattered} a ~~whole~~ ^{whole} lot more of them. ~~When~~ ^{They allowed} the work we'd done in the trench ^{to} go to ruin and left the whole place like a sewage-farm for us to take over again. We were sick as muck. We reported them several times to brigade-head-quarters, but they never got any better. Slack officers, of course. Well, they got smashed, as I say, and were sent away to be lines-of-communication troops. Now we work with the ^{first} South Wales Borderers. They're all right. Awful chaps those territorial ~~battalions~~ ^{swine}. Usen't to trouble about latrines at all; left food about and that encouraged rats; never filled a sandbag. I only once saw a job of work that they did. That was a steel loop-hole they put in. But they put it facing square to the front and quite unmasked, so they'd had two men killed at it - ~~bloody~~ ^{absolute} death-trap. About our chaps. They're all right, but not as right as they ought to be. The survivors of the show ten days ago are feeling pretty low and the big new draft doesn't know anything yet.*

"Listen," said Walker "there is too much firing going on. The men have got the wind up over something. Waste of ammunition, and if Fritz knows we're jumpy he'll give us an extra bad time. I'll go up and stop them."

Dunn went on. "These Welshmen are peculiar. They won't stand being shouted at. They'll do anything if you explain the reason for it. They will do and die but they have to ^{know} ~~have~~ their reason why. The best way to make them behave is not to give them too much time to think. Work them off their feet. They are good workmen. Officers must work too, not only direct the work. Our time-table is like this. Breakfast ^{at} eight o'clock in the morning, clean trenches and inspect rifles, work all morning; lunch at twelve, work again from one till about six, then the men feed again. 'Stand to' at dusk for about an hour, work all night, 'stand to' for an hour before dawn. That's the general programme. Then there's sentry duty. The men do two-hour sentry spells, then work two hours, then sleep two hours. At night sentries are doubled, so our working parties are smaller. We officers are on duty all day and divide up the night in four-hourly watches." He looked at his wrist watch, "I say," he said, "that carrying party ^{must} ~~will~~ have got ^{the} ~~their~~ R.E. stuff by now. Time we all got to work. Look here, Graves, you lie down and have a doss on that bunk. I want you to take the watch before 'stand to.' I'll wake you up and show you round. Where the hell's my revolver? I don't like to go out without that. Hallo, Walker, what was wrong?"

Walker laughed, "A chap from the new draft. He had never fired his musketry course at Cardiff, and to-night he fired ball for the first time. It seemed to go to his head. He'd had a brother killed up at Ypres and he said was posted. He asked Sergeant ^{Eastmond} [redacted] to give me any information that I wanted, then he went back to sleep, telling me to wake him up at once if anything was wrong. I was left in charge of the line. Sergeant ^{Eastmond} [redacted] was busy with a working-party, so I went round by myself. The men of the working-party who were building up the traverses with sandbags (a traverse I learned was a safety-butress in the trench) looked curiously at me. They were filling sandbags with earth, piling them up^x bricklayer-fashion, with headers and stretchers alternating, then patting them flat with spades. [redacted] [redacted]. The sentries stood on the fire-step at the corners of the traverses, stamping their feet and blowing on their fingers. Every now and then they peered over the top for a few seconds. Two parties ^{each} of an N.C.O. and two men ^{each} were out in the company listening-posts, connected with the front trench by a sap about fifty yards long. The German front line was about three hundred yards beyond them. From berths hollowed in the sides of the trench and curtained with sandbags came the grunt of sleeping men. ^PI jumped up on the fire-step beside the sentry and cautiously raising my head stared over the parapet. I could see nothing except the wooden pickets supporting our protecting barbed wire entanglement and a dark patch or two of bushes beyond. The darkness seemed to move and shake about as I looked at it; the bushes started travelling ^{to} singly at first, then both together. The pickets were doing the same. I was glad of the sentry beside me; his name he told me was Beaumont. "They're quiet to-night, sir," he said, "a relief going on, I think so, surely." I said, "It's funny how those bushes seem to move." "Aye, they do play a queer tricks. Is this your first spell in trenches, sir?" A German flare shot up, broke into bright flame, dropped slowly and went hissing into the grass just behind our trench, showing up the bushes and pickets. Instinctively I moved. "It's bad to do that, sir," he said, as a rifle bullet cracked and seemed to pass right between us. "Keep still, sir, and they can't spot you. Not but what a flare is a bad thing to have fall on you. I've seen them burn a hole in a man."

I spent the rest of my watch in acquainting myself with the geography of the ~~place~~^{trench-section}, finding how easy it was to get lost among cul de sacs and disused alleys. Twice I overshot the ~~company position~~^{company position} and wandered ~~into~~^{among} the Munsters on the left. Once I tripped and fell with a splash into deep mud. At last my watch was ended with the first signs of dawn. I passed the word along the line for the company to stand to arms. The N.C.O's whispered hoarsely into the dug-outs "Stand to", "Stand to" and out the men tumbled with their rifles in their hands. As I went towards company headquarters to wake the officers I saw a man lying on his face in a machine-gun shelter. I stopped and said "Stand to, there." I flashed my torch on him and saw that his foot was bare. The machine-gunner beside him said, "No good talking to him, sir." I asked "What's wrong? What's he taken his boot and sock off for?" I was ready for anything odd in the trenches. "Look for yourself, sir," he said. I shook the man by the arm and noticed suddenly that the back of his head was blown out. The first corpse that I saw in France was this suicide. He had taken off his boot and sock to pull the trigger of his rifle with his toe; the muzzle was in his mouth. "Why did he do it?" I said. "He was in the last push, sir, and that sent him a bit queer, and on top of that he got bad news from Limerick about his girl and another chap." He was not a Welshman, but belonged to the Munsters; their machine-guns were at the extreme left of our company. The suicide had already been reported and two Irish officers came up. "We've had two or three of these lately," one of them told me. Then he said to the other, "While I remember, Callaghan, don't forget to write to his next-of-kin. Usual sort of letter, cheer them up, tell them he died a soldier's death, anything you like. I'm not going to report it as suicide."

At stand-to rum and tea were served out. I had a look at the German trenches through a periscope - a low course of sandbags four hundred yards away. Some of these were made of coloured stuff, whether for camouflage or from a shortage of plain canvas I do not know. There was no sign of the enemy, except for a wisp or two of wood-smoke where they too were boiling up a hot drink. Between us and them was a flat meadow with cornflowers, marguerites and poppies growing in the long grass, a few shell holes, the bushes I had seen the night before, the wreck of an aeroplane, our barbed wire and theirs. A thousand yards away was a big ruined house, behind that a red-brick village (Auchy), poplars and haystacks, a tall chimney, another village (Haisnes). Half-right was a pithead and and smaller slag-heaps. La Bassée lay half-left; the sun caught the weather-vane of the church and made it twinkle. I went off for a sleep. The time between "stand-to" and breakfast was the easy part of the day. The men who were not getting in a bit of extra sleep^x sat about talking and smoking, writing letters home, cleaning their rifles, running their thumb-nails up the seams of their shirts to kill the lice, gambling. Lice were a standing joke. Young Bumford handed me one like this. "We was just having an argument as to whether it was best to kill the old ones^r the young ones, sir. Morgan here says that if you kill the old ones, the young ones will die of grief, but Parry here, sir, he says that the young ones are easier to kill and you can catch the old ones when they come to the funeral." He appealed to me as an arbiter. "You've been to college, sir, haven't you?" I said, yes I had but so had Crawshay Bailey's brother Norwich. This was held to be a wonderfully witty answer. Crawshay Bailey is one of the idiotic songs of Wales.

(Crawshay Bailey himself "had an engine and he couldn't make it go" and all his relations in the song had similar shortcomings. Crawshay Bailey's brother^x Norwich, for instance, was fond of oatmeal porridge, and was sent to ^{Carriff} College, for to get a bit of knowledge). After that I had no trouble with the platoon at all.

Breakfast at company headquarters was bacon, eggs, coffee, toast and marmalade. There were three chairs and two ammunition boxes to sit on. Accustomed to company commanders in England not taking their junior officers into their confidence, I was struck by the way that questions of the day were settled at meal-times by a sort of ^{board} meeting with Dunn as ^{chairman}. On this first morning there was a long debate as to the best way of keeping sentries awake. Dunn finally decided to issue ^{a company} an order against sentries leaning up against the traverse; it made them sleepy. Besides when they fired their rifles the flash would come always from the same place. The Germans might fix a rifle on the spot after a time. I told Dunn of the bullet that came between Beaumont and myself. "Sounds like a fixed rifle," he said, "because not one aimed shot in a hundred comes as close as that at night. And we had a chap killed in that very traverse the night we came in." The Bavarian Guards Reserve were opposite us at the time and their shooting was good. They had complete control of the sniping situation.

Dunn began telling me the characters of the men in my platoon; also which N.C.O's were trustworthy and which had to be watched. He was going on to tell me just how much to expect from the men at my platoon inspection of rifles and equipment, when there was a sudden alarm. Dunn's servant came rushing in, his eyes blank with horror and excitement, "Gas, sir, gas! They're using gas." "My God," said Price. We all looked at Dunn. He said imperturbably, "Very well, Kingdom, bring me my respirator from the other room, and another pot of marmalade." This was only one of many gas-alarms. It originated with smoke from the German trenches where breakfast was also going on; we knew the German meal-times by a slackening down of rifle-fire. Gas was a nightmare. Nobody believed in the efficacy of the respirators though we were told that they were absolutely proof against any gas the enemy could send over. Pink army forms marked "Urgent" were constantly arriving from headquarters to explain how to use these contrivances. They were all contradictory. First, the respirators were to be kept soaking wet, then they were to be kept dry, then they were to be worn in a satchel, then again the satchel was not to be used.

Frank Jones-Bateman came to visit me from the company on our right. He mentioned ^{with a false case} ~~that he~~ that he had shot a man just before breakfast. "Sights at four hundred", he said. He was a quiet, ~~some~~ boy of nineteen, he had just left Rugby and had a scholarship waiting for him at Clare, Cambridge. His nickname was Silent Night.

CHAPTER XII.

Here are extracts from letters that I wrote at this time.

May 21st. 1915.

*Back in billets again at a coal-mining village called La Bourse. It is not more than three miles and a half from the trenches but the mines are still working. As we came out of the trenches the Germans were shelling the wood by Cambrin village searching for one of our batteries. I don't think they got it but it was fun to see the poplar trees being lopped down like tulips when the whizz-bangs hit them square. When we marched ^{along} down the paved road from Cambrin the men straggled about out of step and out of fours. Their feet were sore from having had their boots on for a week ^{they} only have one spare pair of socks issued to them. I enclose a list of their minimum load, which weighs about sixty pounds. A lot of extras get put on top of this—rations, pick or shovel, periscope, and their own souvenirs to take home on leave.

Great coat	1.	Cardigan	1
Tins Mess	1.	Cap fatigue comforter	1.
" " Cover	1.	Pay Book.	1
Shirts	1.	Disc, ^{identity.}	1
Socks, ^{pairs}	1.	Waterproof sheet	1.
Soap	1.	Tin of grease	1.
Towel	1.	Field service dressing.	1
Housewife	1.	Respirator.	1
Holdall	1.	Spine protector	1.
Razor	1.	Jack knife	1.
Case Razor	1.	Set of Equipment.
Lather brush	1.	200 Rounds ammunition.	150
Comb	1.	Rifle and Bayonet.
Fork	1.	Rifle Cover.	1
Knife	1.	Oil bottle and pull
Spoon	1.	through.
Tooth brush	1.	Entrenching tool	1.
Laces ² pairs	1

Well, anyhow, marching on cobbled roads is difficult, so when a staff officer came by in a Rolls-Royce and cursed us for bad march-discipline I felt like throwing something at him. Trench soldiers hate the staff and the staff know it. The principal disagreement seems to be ~~about discipline and trench conditions~~ ^{about the extent to which} trench conditions should modify ~~discipline~~ ^{discipline}. The La Bourse miners are old men and boys dressed in sloppy blue clothes with bulging pockets. There are shell craters all around the pit-head. I am billeted with a fatherly old man called Monsieur Hojdes, who has three marriageable daughters; one of them ~~lifted up her skirt to show me a shell-wound on her thigh that~~ laid her up last winter.*

May 22nd.

*A colossal bombardment by the French at Souchez, a few miles away, continuous roar of artillery, coloured flares, shells bursting all along the ridge by Notre Dame de Lorette. I couldn't sleep. It went on all night. Instead of dying away it grew and grew till the whole air rocked and shook; the sky was lit up with huge flashes. I lay in my feather bed and sweated. This morning they tell me there was a big thunderstorm in the middle of the bombardment. But as Walker says, "Where the gunder ended and the thunder began was hard to say." The men had hot baths at the mines and cleaned up generally. Their rifles are all in an advanced state of disrepair and many of their clothes are in rags but neither can be replaced, we are told, until they are much worse. The platoon is billeted in a barn full of straw. Old Burford, who is so old that he refuses to sleep with the other men of the platoon, has found a doss in an out-building among some farm tools. In trenches he will sleep on the fire-step even in the rain rather than in a warm dug-out with the other men. He says that he remembers the C.O. when he was in long skirts and still crapping yellow. Young Bumford is the only man he'll talk to. The platoon is always ragging Bumford for his childish simplicity. Bumford plays up to it and begs them not to be too hard on "a lad from the hills."

May 23rd.

↪We did company drill in the morning. Afterwards Jones-Bateman and I lay on the warm grass and watched the aeroplanes flying above the trenches pursued by a trail of white shrapnel puffs. In the evening I was detailed to take out a working-party to Vermelles les Noyelles to work on a second line of defence trench digging and putting up barbed wires under an R.E. officer. But the ground was hard and the men were tired out when they got back about 2 o'clock in the morning. They sang songs all the way home. They have one about Company-quartermaster-sergeant Finnigan :-

↪Coolness under fire,
Coolness under fire,
Mentioned in dispatches
For pinching the company rations,
Coolness under fire.

Now he's on the peg,
Now he's on the peg,
Mentioned in dispatches
For drinking the company rum,
Now he's on the peg.'

The chorus is:-

'Whiter than the milky cokernuts,
Whiter than the milky cokernuts,
Wash me in the water
That you washed your dirty daughter in
And I shall be whiter than the milky cokernuts.

Nuts
Nuts
Oooooh nuts."

Finigan doesn't mind the libel at all.

This is what happened the other day. Two young miners, in another company, disliked their sergeant who had a ~~down~~ on them and gave them all the most dirty and dangerous jobs. When they were in billets he "crimed" them for things they hadn't done. So they decided to kill him. Later they reported at Battalion Orderly Room and asked to see the adjutant. This was irregular because a private is not allowed to speak to an officer without an N.C.O. ^{of his own company} to act as go-between. The adjutant happened to see them and said, "Well, what is it you want?" Smartly slapping the small-of-the-butt of their sloped rifles they said, "We've come to report, sir, that we are very sorry but we've shot our company-sergeant-major." The adjutant said, "Good heavens, how did that happen?" They answered "It was an accident, sir." "What do you mean? Did you mistake him for a German?" "No, sir, we mistook him for our platoon sergeant." So they were both shot by a firing squad of their own company against the wall of a convent at Bethune. Their last words were the battalion rallying-cry "Stick it, the Welsh!" (They say that a certain Captain Haggard first used it in the ~~the~~ battle of Ypres when he was mortally wounded.) The French military governor was present at the execution and made a little speech saying how gloriously British soldiers can die.

You would be surprised at the amount of waste that goes on in trenches. Ration biscuits are in general use as fuel for boiling up dixies, because fuel is scarce. Our machine-gun crews boil their hot water by firing off belt after belt of machine-gun ammunition at no particular target, just generally spraying the German line. After several pound's worth of ammunition has been used the water in the guns - they are water-cooled - begins to boil. They say they make German ration and carrying parties behind the line pay for their early morning cup of tea. But the real charge will be on income-tax after the war.*

May 24th.

*To-morrow we return to trenches, the men are ~~unsuccessfully~~ ^{but cheerful} pessimistic. They all talk about getting a 'cushy' one to send them back to 'Blitey.' Blitey is, it seems, Hindustani for ~~home~~ ^{'home'}. My servant, Fry, who works in a paper-bag factory ~~in~~ ^{at} Cardiff in civil life, has been telling me stories about cushy ones. Here are two of them. "A bloke in the Munsters once wanted a cushy so he waves his hand above the parapet to catch Fritz's attention. Nothing doing. He waves his arms about for a couple of minutes. Nothing doing, not a shot. He puts his elbows on the fire-step, hoists his body upside down and waves his legs about till he gets blood to the head. Not a shot did old Fritz fire. 'Oh,' says the Munster man, 'I don't believe there's a damn square-head there. Where's the German army to?' He has a peek over the top, crack! he gets it in the head. Finee." Another story:- "Bloke in the Camerons wanted a cushy bad. Fed up and far from home, he was. He puts his hand over the top and gets his trigger finger taken off, and two more beside. That done the trick. He comes laughing through our lines by the old boutillery. 'See, lads,' he says, 'I'm aff to bony Scotland. Is it na a beauty?' But on the way down the trench to the dressing station he forgets to stoop low where the old sniper was working. He gets it through the head too. Finee. We laugh fit to die."

To get a cushy one is all that the old hands think of. Only twelve men have been with the battalion from the beginning and they are all transport men except one, Beaumont, a man in my platoon. The few old hands who went through the last fight infect the new men with pessimism; they don't believe in the war, they don't believe in the staff. But at least they would follow their officers anywhere, because the officers happen to be a decent lot. They look forward to a battle because a battle gives more chances of a cushy one, in the legs or arms, than trench warfare. In trench warfare the proportion of head wounds is much greater. Haking commands this division. He's the man who wrote the standard text-book Company Training. The last shows have not been suitable ones for company commanders to profit by his directions. He's a decent man; he came round this morning to an informal inspection of the battalion and shook hands with the survivors. There were tears in his eyes. Sergeant Smith swore half-aloud, "Bloody lot of use that is, busts up his bloody division and then weeps over what's bloody left." Well, it was nothing to do with me; I didn't allow myself to feel either for the general or for the sergeant. It is said here that Haking has told General French that the division's morale has gone completely. So far as I can see that is not accurate; the division will fight all right but ~~without any enthusiasm.~~ ^{without any enthusiasm.} It is said too that when the new-army comes out the division will be withdrawn and used on lines of communication for some months at least. I don't believe it. I am sure no one will mind smashing up ^{over and over again,} the divisions that are used to being smashed up, [redacted]. The general impression here is that the new-army divisions can't be of much military use.*

May 28th.

*In trenches among the Quinchey brick-stacks. Not my idea of trenches. There has been a lot of fighting hereabouts. The trenches have made themselves rather than been made and run inconsequently in and out of the big thirty-foot high stacks of brick; it is most confusing. The parapet of one of the trenches which we do not occupy is built up with ammunition boxes and corpses. Everything here is wet and smelly. The lines are very close. The Germans have half the brick-stacks and we have the other half. ^{Each} sides snipes down from the top of ^{is} brick-stacks into the other's trenches. ^{This} is also a great place for rifle grenades and trench mortars. We can't reply properly to these; we have only a meagre supply of rifle grenades and nothing to equal the German "sausage" mortar bomb. This morning, about breakfast time, just as I came out of my dug-out a rifle grenade landed within six feet of me. For some reason [redacted] instead of ^{falling} on its head and exploding it landed with its stick in the wet clay and stood there looking at me. They are difficult to see coming; they are shot from a rifle ^{with its butt on the ground, tilted,} and go up a long way before they turn over and come down. I can't understand why this particular rifle grenade fell as it did, the chances ^{were} ^{impossibly} against it.

Sausages are easy to see and dodge, but they make a terrible noise when they drop. [redacted] We have had about ten casualties in our company to-day from them. I find that I have extraordinary ^{ily} quick reactions to danger; but everyone gets like that. We can sort out all the different explosions and disregard all the ones that don't concern us - the artillery duel, machine-gun fire at the next company to us, desultory rifle-fire. ^{But} the faint plop! of the mortar that sends off the sausage or the muffled rifle-noise when a grenade is fired we pick out at once. The men are much afraid yet always joking. The company-sergeant-major stands behind one of the brick-stacks and shoots at the sausages with a rifle as they come over; trying to explode them in the air. He says that it's better than pigeon shooting. He hasn't hit one yet. Last night a lot of stuff was flying about, including shrapnel. I heard one shell whish-whishing towards me. ~~was~~ I dropped flat. It burst just over the trench. My ears sang as though there were gnats in them and a bright scarlet light shone over everything. My shoulder was twisted in falling and I thought I had been hit, but I hadn't been. The vibration made my chest sing, too, in a curious way, and I lost my sense of equilibrium. I was much ashamed when the sergeant-major came along the trench and found me on all fours, because I couldn't stand up straight.

There has been a dead man lying on the fire-step waiting to be taken down to the cemetery to-night. He ^{was a sanitary man in the open while burying laundry-stuff between our front and support lines.} was killed last night.

His arm was stretched out and when he was got in it was still stiff, so that when they put him on the fire-step his stiff arm stretched right across the trench. His comrades joke as they push it out of the way to get by. "Out of the light, you old bastard. Do you own this bloody trench?" Or they shake hands with him familiarly. "Put it there, Billy boy." Of course, they're mixers and accustomed to death. ^{They}

~~They~~ have a very limited morality but they keep to it.

They will, for instance, rob anyone of anything, except a man in their own platoon; they will treat every stranger as an enemy until he is proved their friend and then there is nothing they won't do for him. They are lecherous, the young ones at least, but without the false shame of the English lecher. I had a letter to censor the other day written by a lance-corporal to his wife. He said ~~very~~ that the French girls were ^{very} nice to sleep with so she mustn't worry on his account, but that he far preferred sleeping with her and missed her a great deal.

June 6th.

"We have been billeted in Bethune, a fair-sized town about seven miles or so behind the front line. There is everything one wants, a swimming bath, all sorts of shops, especially a cake-shop the best I've ever ^{come across} ~~seen~~, a hotel where you can get a really good dinner, and a theatre where we have Brigade 'gaffs.' I saw a notice this morning on a building by the Bethune-La Bassée canal. "Troops are forbidden to bomb fish. By order of the Town Major." Bethune is very little knocked about except a part called Faubourg d'Arras near the station. I am billeted with a family called Averlant Paul, in the Avenue de Bruay, people of the official class. ~~They~~ ^{are} refugees from Poimbert. There are two little boys and an elder sister who is in what corresponds with the under-fifth of the local high-school. She was worried last night over her lessons and asked me to help her write out the theory of decimal division. She showed me the notes she had taken; they were full of abbreviations. I asked why she'd used abbreviations. She said 'The lady professor talked ^{very} fast ~~so~~ because we were much hurried.' "Why were you hurried?" "Oh, because part of the school is used as a billet for the troops and the Germans were shelling it and we were always having to take shelter in the cellar, and when we came back each time there was less and less time left!"

June 10th.

"I am beginning to realise how lucky I was in my gentle introduction to the trenches at Cambrin. We are now in a nasty salient a little to the south of the brick-stacks, where casualties are always heavy. The company had seventeen casualties yesterday from bombs and grenades. The front trench averages thirty yards from the Germans. To-day at one part, which is only twenty yards away from an occupied German sap, I came along whistling "The Farmer's Boy" to keep up my spirits when suddenly I saw a group bending over a man lying at the bottom of the trench. He was making a snoring noise mixed with animal groans. At my feet was the cap he had worn splashed with his brains. I had never seen human brains before; I had somehow regarded them as a poetical figment. One can joke with a badly wounded man and congratulate him on being out of it, one can disregard ^a ~~the~~ dead man. But even a miner can't make a joke that sounds like a joke over a man who takes three hours to die after the top part of his head has been taken off by a bullet fired at twenty yards range. Beaumont, of whom I told you in my last letter was also lying killed. He was the last survivor of the original battalion except for the transport men. He had his legs blown against his back. Everyone was swearing angrily, then an R.E. officer came up and told me that there was a tunnel driven under the German front line and that if we wanted to do a bit of bombing, now was the time. So he sent the mine up ^{—it was not a big one, he said, but it made a tremendous noise and covered us with dirt—} and the chaps waited for a few seconds for the other Germans to rush up to help the wounded away and then they chucked all the bombs they had.

Beaumont had been telling me how he had won about five pounds in the sweepstake after the Rue de Bois show. It was a sweepstake of the sort that leaves no bitterness behind it. Before a show the platoon pools all its available cash and the winners, who are the survivors, divide it up afterwards. Those who are killed ~~lose~~ ^{can't complain} ~~lose~~, the wounded would have given far more than that to escape as they have, and the unwounded regard the money as a consolation prize for still being here."

June 24th.

"We are billeted in the cellars of Vermelles ~~the~~
^{which} ~~place~~ was taken and re-taken eight times last October.
There is not a single house undamaged in the place. I suppose it once had two or three thousand inhabitants.
It is ~~very~~ beautiful now in a ~~fantastic~~ way. We came up two nights ago and there was a moon shining ~~through~~ ^{behind} the ~~houses~~ houses and the shells had ~~broken~~ ^{broken up} all the hard lines. ~~Substantially irregular.~~ This morning we found the deserted gardens of the town very pleasant to walk about in; they are quite overgrown and flowers have seeded themselves about ~~the~~ ^{wildly} ~~town~~ Red cabbages and roses and madonna lilies are the chief ornaments.
There is one garden with currant bushes in. I and the company-sergeant-major started eating along the line towards each other without noticing each other. When we did, we both remembered our dignity, he as a company-sergeant-major and I as an officer. He saluted, I acknowledged the salute, we both walked away. After a minute or two we both came back hoping the coast was clear and again, after an exchange of salutes, had to leave the currants and pretend that we were merely admiring the flowers. I don't quite know why I was feeling like that. The company-sergeant-major was a regular and it was natural in him, and I suppose that it was courtesy to his scruples that made me stop.
Anyhow, along came a couple of privates and stripped the bushes clean.

This afternoon we had a cricket match, officers versus sergeants, in an enclosure between some houses

out of observation from the enemy. They are perhaps three quarters of a mile away. I made top score, twenty-four; the bat was a bit of a rafter, the ball was a piece of rag tied round with string, and the wicket was a parrot cage with the grisly remains of a parrot inside. It had evidently died of starvation when the French evacuated the town. The corpse was perfectly clean and dry and I recalled a verse of Skelton's :-

Parrot is a fair bird for a ladie.
God of his goodness ~~him~~ framed and wrought.
When parrot is dead he doth not putrify,
Yea, all things mortal shall turn ~~into~~ nought
Save mannes soul which Christ so dear bought,
That never can die, nor never die shall.
Make much of parrot, that popajay royal. ^E

The match was broken up suddenly by machine-gun fire. It was ~~not aimed at us~~ ^{not aimed at us} the Germans were shooting at one of our aeroplanes and the bullets falling down from a great height had ~~greater~~ ^a penetrative power ~~greater than~~ ^{greater than} an ordinary spent bullet.

This is a very idle life except for night-digging on the reserve line. By day there is nothing to do. We can't drill because it is too near ^{the German lines} and there is no fortification work to be done in the village. To-day two spies were shot. A civilian who had hung on in a cellar and had apparently been flashing news, and a German soldier disguised as an R.E. corporal who was found tampering with the telephone wires. We officers spend a lot of time practising revolver-shooting. Jenkins brought out a beautiful target from the only undestroyed living-room in our billet area. It was a glass case full of artificial fruit and flowers, so we put it up on a post at fifty yards range. He said "I've always wanted to smash one of these damn things. My aunt had one. It's just the sort of thing that would survive an intense bombardment." ~~I thought~~ ^{I thought} for a moment ~~of~~ rescuing it ~~that~~ ~~was~~ ~~in~~ ~~the~~ ~~post~~ ~~at~~ ~~Schloss~~ ~~Wulfen~~. ^{I smothered this.} But ~~that~~ ~~would~~ ~~have~~ ~~been~~ ~~useless~~. So we had five shots each, in turn. Nobody could hit it. So at last we went up to within twenty yards of it and fired a volley. Someone hit the post and that knocked it off into the grass. Jenkins said, "Damn the thing, it ^{must be} bewitched." ~~Let's~~ Let's take it back." The glass was unbroken but some of the fruit had come loose. Walker said, "No, it's in pain, we must put it out of its suffering". He gave it the coup de grace from close quarters.

^{I felt a tender impulse to}

There is an old Norman church here, very much broken. ^{What is left} ~~of~~ the tower ~~is~~ ~~left~~. I counted eight unexploded shells sticking ^(into it.) ~~is~~ used as a forward observation post by the artillery. I went in ~~the~~ with Jenkins; the floor was littered with rubbish, broken masonry, smashed chairs, ripped canvas pictures (some of them look ^{several hundreds of years old} like ~~old~~), bits of images and crucifixes, ^{muddied} church vestments rotting in what was once the vestry, ~~and~~ only a few ^{pieces} of stained glass ^{remained} ~~fixed~~ ^{fixed} in the edges of the windows. I climbed ^{up} by way of the altar to the east window and found ~~a~~ ~~piece~~ ~~of~~ ~~glass~~ ~~about~~ ~~the~~ ~~size~~ ~~of~~ ~~a~~ ~~plate~~. I gave it to Jenkins. "Souvenir₃", I said. When he held it up to the light it was St. Peter's hand with the keys of heaven; mediaeval glass. "I'm sending this home₂", he said. As we went out we met two men of the Munsters. They were Irish catholics. They thought it sacriligious for Jenkins to be taking the glass away. One of them said, "Shouldn't take that, sir, it will bring you no luck." *

Walker was ragging Dunn¹¹ this evening. 'I believe

* Jenkins was killed not long after.

you'll be sorry when the war's over, skipper. Your occupation will be gone and you'll have to go back on the Square at the Depot for six months and learn how to form fours regimentally. You missed that little part of the show when you left Sandhurst and came straight here. You'll be a full Colonel by then, of course. I'll give the sergeant-major half-a-crown to make you really sweat. I'll be standing in civvies at the barrack-gate laughing at you.'

There is a company commander here called Furber. His nerves are in pieces and somebody played a dirty joke on him the other day rolling a bomb, undetonated of course, down the cellar steps to frighten him. ^{This was} ~~the~~ thought ^a ~~was~~ a great joke. Furber is the greatest pessimist out here. He's laid a bet with the adjutant that the trench lines will not be more than a mile from where they are in this sector two years hence. Everyone laughs at Furber but they like him because he sings sentimental Cockney songs at the brigade "gaffs" when we are back at Bethune.

CHAPTER XIII.

~~Now as the summer advanced~~ ^{there} ~~came~~ ~~with the new~~ types of bombs ^{and} trench mortars, heavier shelling, improved gas-masks and a general tightening up of discipline. We saw the first battalions of the new army and felt like scarecrows by comparison. We went in and out of the Cambrin and Guinchey trenches, with billets in Bethune and the neighbouring villages. By this time I had caught the pessimism of the division. ^{its spirit in} ~~In~~ the trenches ~~the~~ was largely defensive; the policy was not to stir the Germans into more than their usual hostility. But ~~the~~ casualties were still very heavy for trench warfare. Pessimism made everyone superstitious. I became superstitious too; I found myself believing in signs of the most trivial nature. Sergeant ^{Eastmond} ~~S~~ told me of my predecessor in command of the platoon. "He was a nice gentleman, sir, but very wild. Just before the Rue du Bois show he says to me: 'By the way, sergeant, I'm going to get killed to-morrow. I know that. And I know that you're going to be all right. So see that my kit goes back to my people. You'll find their address in my pocket-book. You'll find five hundred francs there too. Now remember this, Sergeant ^{Eastmond} ~~S~~, you keep a hundred francs yourself and divide up the rest among the chaps left.' He says, 'Send my pocket-book back with my other stuff, Sergeant ^{Eastmond} ~~S~~, but for God's sake burn my diary. They mustn't see that. I'm going to get it here!' ~~He~~ points to his forehead. And that's how it was. He got it through the forehead all right. I sent the stuff back to his parents. I divided up the money and I burnt the diary."

~~One day~~ ^{One day} I was walking along a trench at Cambrin when I suddenly dropped flat on my face; two seconds later a whizz-bang struck the back of the trench exactly where I had been. The sergeant who was with me, walking a few steps ahead, rushed back, "Are you killed, sir?" ~~What I could understand was that~~ The shell was fired from a battery near Auchy only a thousand yards away, so that ~~it~~ ^{it} must have arrived before the sound. ^{of the gun} How did I know that I should throw myself on my face? ~~That~~ ~~_____~~ I saw a ghost at Béthune. He was a man called Private Challoner who had been at Lancaster with me and again in F. company at Wrexham. When he ~~_____~~ ^{went} out ~~_____~~ ^{with a draft to join} the First Battalion he ~~_____~~ ^{shook} my hand ~~_____~~ and said, "I'll meet you again in France, sir." He had been killed at Festubert in May and in June he passed by ~~_____~~ ^{our} C. company billet where we were just having a special dinner to celebrate our safe return from Guinchey. There was fish, new potatoes, green peas, asparagus, mutton chops, strawberries and cream and three bottles of Pommard. Challoner ~~_____~~ looked in at the window, saluted and passed on. There ~~_____~~ ^{was} no ~~_____~~ ^{on the cap-badge he was wearing, there was no Royal Welch battalion billeted within miles of Béthune} mistaking him. I jumped up and looked out of the window but ~~_____~~ ^{saw} nothing ~~_____~~ except a fag-end smoking on the pavement. ~~_____~~ ^{Ghosts} were numerous in France at the time.

There was constant mining going on in this Cambrin-Guinchey sector. ~~_____~~ ^{We had} the prospect of being blown up at any moment. An officer of the ~~_____~~ ^{R.E.} tunnelling company was awarded the Victoria Cross while we were ~~_____~~ ^{here} ~~_____~~ ^{was going on.} A duel of mining and counter-mining. The Germans ~~_____~~ began to undermine his original boring, so he ~~_____~~ rapidly tunnelled underneath them. It was touch and go who would get the mine ready first. He won. But when he detonated it from the trench by an electric lead, nothing happened. He ran down again into the mine, retamped the charge, and was just back in time to set it off before the Germans. I had been into the upper boring on the previous day. It was about twenty feet under the German lines. At the end of the gallery I found a Welsh miner, one of our own ~~_____~~ ^{men} who had transferred to the Royal Engineers, on listening duty. He cautioned me to silence. I could distinctly hear the Germans working somewhere underneath. He whispered, "So long as they work I don't mind; it's when they stop." He did his two-hour spell by candle-light. It was very stuffy. He was reading a book. The mining officer had told me that they were allowed to read; it didn't interfere with their listening. It was a paper-backed book called "From Mill Girl to Duchess." The men of the tunnelling companies were notorious thieves ^{by the way}

They would snatch things up from the trench and scurry off with them into their borings; just like mice.

After one particularly bad spell of trenches I got bad news in a letter from Charterhouse. ~~Something~~ Bad news in the trenches ~~might affect a man in either of~~ (two ways) ~~to~~ ~~recklessness amounting to suicide~~ or it ~~seemed~~ ^{might} ~~trivial~~ ⁱⁿ comparison with present experiences. ~~and be disregarded.~~ But unless his leave was due he was helpless.

About a year later when I was in trenches in ~~the~~ the same sector an officer of the North Staffordshire Regiment had news from home that his wife was living with another man. He went out on a raid the same night and was either killed or captured; so the men with him said. There had been a fight and they had come back without him. Two days later he was arrested at Bethune trying to board a leave-train to go home; he had intended to shoot ^{up} the wife and her lover ~~trailer~~. He was court-martialed ^{in the face of the enemy} for deserting but the court was content to cashier him. He went as a private soldier to another regiment. I ~~do not~~ know what happened afterwards.

The ~~letter~~ ^{bad news} was about Dick, saying that he had been misbehaving with one of the monitors in his house. It was ~~written~~ ^{sent me} by my ~~younger~~ ^a ~~brother~~ ^{cousin of mine who was still at Charterhouse.} and cousin. I tried not to believe it. I remembered that ~~he~~ ^{he} owed me a grudge and decided that this was a very cruel act of spite. Dick's letters had been my greatest standby all these months when I was feeling low; he wrote every week, mostly about poetry. They were something solid and clean to set off against the impermanence of trench life and the uncleanness of sex-life in billets. I was now ~~back in Bethune.~~ ^{back in Bethune.} ~~Two officers of another company~~ had just been telling me how they had slept, in the same room, one with the mother and one with the daughter. They had tossed for the mother because the daughter was a "yellow-looking little thing like a lizard." And the "Red Lamp," the army brothel, was round the corner in the main street. I had seen a queue of a hundred ^{and fifty} men waiting outside the door, each to have his short turn with one or the other of the three women in the house. My ^{servant} ~~boy~~, who had been in the queue, told me that the charge was ten francs a man ^{and} about eight shillings at that time. Each woman served nearly a battalion of men every week for as long as she lasted. The assistant-provost-marshal had told me that three weeks was the usual limit, "after which the woman retires on her earnings, pale but proud." I was always being teased because I wouldn't ^{not} sleep even with the nicer girls. ~~_____~~ I excused myself not on moral grounds or on grounds of fastidiousness but in the only way that they could understand; I said that I didn't want a dose. A good deal of talk in billets was about the peculiar bed-manners of the French women. "She was very nice and full of games. I said to her "S'il vous plait, ôtes-^{toi} la chemise, ma chérie." But she wouldn't. She said, "Oh no! -non, mon lieutenant. Ce n'est pas convenable." I was glad when we were back in trenches. And there I had a more or less reassuring letter from Dick. He told me that I was right, that my cousin had a spite against him and me, ~~_____~~ that he had been ragging about in a silly way but ^{that} there was not much harm to it; he was very sorry and would stop it for the sake of our friendship.

At the end of July ^{I am} Robertson, one of the ^{other} five ^{who had} Royal Welch officers ~~_____~~ ^{been attached to the Welsh} got orders to proceed to the Laventie sector some miles to the north. We were to report to the S Second Battalion of the Royal Welch Fusiliers. Frank Jones-Bateman and Hamner Jones, two ^{more of us} ~~_____~~ went to the F First B Battalion.

The ^{remaining} two ~~of~~ of the six had already gone back, McLellan sick, and Watkin with bomb wounds that have kept him limping ever since. We were sorry to say goodbye to the men; ^{they} all crowded round to shake hands and wish us luck. And we felt a little sorry too that we had to start all over again getting to know a new company and new regimental customs. But it ^{would be} ~~all~~ worth it, to be with our own regiment. ^{Robertson!} We agreed to take our journey as leisurely as possible. Laventie was only seventeen miles away but our orders were to go there by train; so a mess-cart took ~~us~~ ^{us} down to Béthune. We asked the railway transport officer what trains he had to Laventie. He told us one was going in a few minutes; we decided to miss ~~it~~ ^{it}. There was no train after that until the next day, so we stopped the night at the Hotel de la France. ~~The~~ ^{The} Prince of Wales, who was a lieutenant in the Fortieth Siege Battery, was billeted there sometimes. He was a familiar figure in Béthune. I only spoke to him once; it was in the public bath where he and I were the only bathers one morning. He was graciously pleased to remark how ^{emphatically} ~~surprisingly~~ cold the water was and I loyally assented that he was ^{emphatically} ~~absolutely~~ right. We were very pink and white and did exercises on the horizontal bar afterwards. I joked to Frank about it, "I have just met our future King in a bath." Frank said, "I can trump that. Two days ago I had a friendly talk with him in the A.S.C. latrines." The Prince's favourite rendezvous was the Globe, a café in the Béthune market-square reserved for British officers and French civilians; principally spies by the look of them. I once heard him indignantly complaining that General French ^{had} ~~refused~~ refused to let him go up into the line.)

The next day we caught our train. It took us to a

junction, the name of which I forget. Here we spent a day, walking about in the fields. There was no train~~x~~ until next day when one took us on to Berguette, a rail-head still a number of miles from Laventie, where a mess-cart was waiting for us in answer to a telegram we had sent. We ^{finally} rattled up to battalion headquarters in Laventie High Street. We had taken fifty-two hours to come seventeen miles. We saluted the adjutant smartly, gave our names and said that we were Third Battalion officers ^{posted} to the regiment. He did not shake hands with us, offer us a drink ^{or give us} a word of welcome. He ~~said~~ ^{said} coldly: "I see. Well, which of you is senior? Oh, never mind. Give your particulars to the regimental sergeant-major. Tell him to post whoever is senior to A. company and the other to B. company." The sergeant-major took our particulars. He introduced me to a second-lieutenant of A. company, to which I was to go. ~~_____~~ ^{He was} a special reservist of the East Surrey regiment. ^{and was known as The Surrey-man} He took me along to the company billet. As soon as we were out of earshot of battalion headquarters I asked him: "What's wrong with the adjutant? Why didn't he shake hands or give me any sort of decent welcome?" ^{The Surrey-man} ~~_____~~ said, "Well, it's your regiment, not mine. They're all like that. You must realise that this is a regular battalion, one of the only four ^{infantry} battalions in France that is still more or less its old self. This is the nineteenth brigade, the luckiest in France. It has not been permanently part of any division, but used as army reserve to put in wherever a division has been badly knocked. So except for the Retreat, where it lost about a company, and Fromelles, where it lost half of what was left, it has been practically undamaged. A lot of the wounded have rejoined since. All our company commanders are regulars and so are all our N.C.O's. The peace-time custom of taking no notice of newly-joined officers is still, ^{more or less} kept up for the first six months. It's bad enough ~~with~~ the Sandhurst chaps, it's worse for special-reservists like you and Rugg and Robertson, it's worse still for outsiders like me from another regiment." We were going down the village street. The men sitting about on the door-steps jumped up smartly to attention as we passed, and saluted with a fixed stony glare. They were magnificent looking men. Their uniforms were spotless, their equipment khaki-blanced and their buttons and cap-badges twinkling. We reached company ^{headquarters}, where I reported to my company commander, ^{Captain} G. O. Thomas. He was a regular of seventeen years service, a well-known polo-player and a fine soldier. This is the order that he would himself have preferred. He shook hands without a word, waved me to a chair, offered a cigarette ~~x~~ and continued writing his letter. I found later that "A" was the best company I could have struck.

~~But~~ ^{The Surrey-man} asked me to help him censor some company letters before going over to the battalion mess for lunch; they were more literate than the ones in the Welsh regiment, but duller. On the way to the Mess he told me more about the battalion. He asked me whether it was my first time out. "I was attached to the Second Welsh Regiment for three months; I commanded a company there for a bit." "Oh, were you? Well, I'd advise you to say nothing at all about it, then they'll not expect too much of you. ~~The G.O. says don't~~ ~~say anything about it to the Welsh Regiment.~~ They treat us like dirt; in a way it will be worse for you than for me because you're a full Lieutenant. They'll resent that, with your short service. There's one lieutenant here of six years service and second lieutenants who have been out here since the autumn. ^{if have already had} There ~~are already~~ two special-reserve captains foisted on them; they're planning to get rid of them somehow. In the mess ^{if A} you ~~can't~~ open your mouth or make the slightest noise ~~the~~ the senior officers ~~will~~ jump down your throat. Only officers of the rank of captain are allowed to drink whisky or turn on the gramophone. We've got to jolly well keep still and look like furniture. It's just like peace time. Mess bills are very high; the mess was in debt at Quetta last year and we are economising now to pay that back. We get practically nothing for our money but ordinary rations and the whisky we aren't allowed to drink. ^{AP} We've even got a polo-ground here. There was a polo-match between the ~~First~~ ⁷ and ~~Second~~ ^S battalions the other day. The First Battalion had had all their decent ponies pinched that time when they were sent up at Ypres and the cooks and transport men had to come up into the line to prevent a break through. So this battalion won easily. Can you ride? No? Well, subalterns who can't ride have to attend riding-school every afternoon while we're in billets. They give us hell, too. Two of us have been at it for four months and haven't passed off yet. They keep us trotting round the field, with crossed stirrups most of the time, and they give us pack-saddles instead of riding-saddles. Yesterday they called us up suddenly without giving us time to change into breeches. That reminds me, you noticed everybody's wearing shorts? Its a regimental order. The battalion thinks it's still in India. They treat the French civilians just like 'niggers,' kick them about, talk army Hindustani at them. It makes me laugh sometimes. Well, what with a greasy pack-saddle, bare knees, crossed stirrups and a wild new transport pony that the transport men had pinched from the French I had a pretty thin time. The colonel, the adjutant, the senior-major, and the transport officer stood at the four corners of the ring and slogged at the ponies as they came round. I came off twice and got wild with anger and nearly decided to ride the senior-major down. The funny thing is that they don't realise that they are treating us badly, — it's such an honour to be serving with the regiment. So the best thing is to pretend you don't care what they do or say.

I protested, "But all this is childish. Is there a war on here or isn't there?"

"The battalion doesn't recognise it socially," he answered, "Still, in trenches, I'd rather be with this battalion than in any other that I have met. The senior officers do know their job, whatever else one says about them, and the N.C.O's are absolutely trustworthy."

The Second Battalion was peculiar in having a battalion mess instead of company messes. ~~The Surrey-man~~ said grimly, "It's supposed to be more sociable." This was another peace-time survival. ~~The Surrey-man~~ ^{We together} went into the big chateau near the church. About fifteen officers of various ranks were sitting in chairs reading the week's illustrated papers, or (the seniors at least) talking quietly. At the door I said "Good morning, gentlemen," the new officer's customary greeting to the mess. There was no answer. Everybody looked at me curiously. The silence that my entry had caused was soon broken by the gramophone which began singing happily:-

"We've been married just one year,
And Oh, we've got the sweetest,
And Oh, we've got the neatest,
And Oh, we've got the cutest Little oil stove."

I found a chair in the background and picked up The Field. The door burst open suddenly and a ~~man~~^{senior officer} with a red face and angry eye burst in. "Who the blazes put that record on?" he shouted to the room. "One of the bloody warts I expect. Take it off somebody. It makes me sick. Let's have some real music. Put on the Angelus." Two subalterns (~~one~~^{in the Royal Welch} a subaltern had to answer to the name of 'wart') sprang up, stopped the gramophone and put on When the Angelus is ringing. ~~The~~^{The} young captain who had put on We've been married shrugged his shoulders and went on reading. The other faces in the room were blank.

"Who was that?" I whispered to ~~the~~^{The Surrey man.} ~~man~~.
He frowned. "That's ~~the~~^{'Bugg Off'} ~~man~~", he said.

Before the record was finished the door opened and in came the Colonel; ~~the~~^{Bugg Off} ~~man~~ reappeared with him. Everybody jumped up and said in unison, "Good morning, sir." It was his first appearance that day. ~~the~~^{Before} ~~man~~ giving the customary greeting and asking us to sit down he turned spitefully to the gramophone: "Who on earth puts this wretched Angelus on every time I come in to the mess? For heaven's sake play something cheery for a change." And with his own hands he took off the Angelus, wound up the gramophone and put on "We've been married just one year" ~~the~~. At that moment a gong rang for lunch and he abandoned it. We filed into the next room, a ball-room with mirrors and a decorated ceiling. We sat down at a long polished table. The seniors sat at the top, the juniors competed for seats as far away from them as possible. I was unlucky enough to get a seat at the foot of the table facing the commanding officer, the adjutant and ~~the~~^{Bugg Off} ~~man~~. There was not a word spoken down that end except for an occasional whisper for the salt or for the beer, very thin French stuff. Robertson, who had not been warned, asked the mess waiter for whisky. "Sorry, sir," said the mess waiter, "it's against orders for the young officers." Robertson was a man of forty-two, a solicitor with a large practice, and had stood for Parliament in the Yarmouth division at the previous election.

I saw ~~the adjutant~~^{Bugs OH} glaring at us and busied myself with my meat and potatoes.

He nudged the adjutant. "Who are those two funny ones down there, Charley?" he asked.

"New this morning from the militia. Answer to the names of Robertson and Graves."

"Which is which?" asked the Colonel.

"I'm Robertson, sir."

"I wasn't asking you."

Robertson winced but said nothing. Then ~~the adjutant~~^{Bugs OH} noticed something.

"The other wart's wearing a wind up tunic." Then he bent forward and asked me loudly. "You there, wart. Why the hell are you wearing your stars on your shoulder instead of your sleeve?"

My mouth was full and I was embarrassed. Everybody was looking at me. I swallowed the lump of meat whole and said, "It was a regimental order in the Welsh Regiment. I understood that it was the same everywhere in France."

The colonel turned puzzled to the adjutant. "What on earth's the man talking about the Welsh Regiment for?" And then to me: "As soon as you have finished your lunch you will visit the master-tailor. Report at the orderly room when you're properly dressed."

There was a severe struggle in me between resentment and regimental loyalty. Resentment for the moment had the better of ~~me~~^{it}. I said under my breath, "You damn ^{ed} snobs. I'll survive you all. There'll come a time when there won't be one of you left serving in the battalion ~~who will~~^{to} remember battalion mess at Laventie." This time came ~~exactly~~ exactly a year later.

We went up to the trenches that night. They were "high-command" trenches. Because water was struck when one dug down three feet; the parapet and parapets were built up man-high. I found my platoon curt and reserved. Even when on sentry duty ^{at night} they would never talk confidentially about themselves and their families like my platoon in the Welsh Regiment. ^{Townsend, the platoon-} The sergeant, was an ex-policeman who had been on the reserve when war broke out. He used to drive his men rather than lead them. A company was at Red Lamp corner: the front trench broke off short here and started again further back on the right. A red lamp was hung at the corner, invisible to the enemy but a warning after dark to the company on ^{our} right not to fire to the left of it. Work and duties were done with a silent soldier-like efficiency quite foreign to the Welsh. ^P The first night I was in trenches my company-commander asked me to go out on patrol; it was the regimental custom to test new officers in this way. All the time that I had been with the Welsh I had never once been out in No Man's Land, even to inspect the barbed wire. In the Welsh Regiment the condition of the wire was, I believe, the responsibility of battalion intelligence officer. I never remember any work done on it by "C" company. I think we left it to the Royal Engineers. ~~It~~ ^When Hewitt, the machine-gun officer, used to go out sometimes on patrol it was regarded as a mad escapade. ~~In the Welsh Regiment it was regarded as a mad escapade to go out in No Man's Land, the Welsh Regiment.~~ But with both battalions of the Royal Welch Fusiliers it was a point of honour to be masters of No Man's Land from dusk to dawn. There was not a night at Laventie that a message did not come down the line from sentry to sentry, "Pass the word: officer's patrol going out." My orders for the patrol were to see whether a German sap-head was occupied by night or not. I went out from ~~the~~ ^{Red} Lamp corner with ~~the~~ ^{Townsend at} sergeant ^L about ten o'clock. We both had revolvers. We pulled socks, with the toes cut off, over our bare knees, to prevent them showing up in the dark and to make crawling easier. We went ten yards at a time, slowly, not on all fours, but wriggling flat along the ground. After each movement we lay and watched for ^{about} ten minutes. We crawled through our own wire entanglements and along a dry ditch; ripping our clothes on more barbed wire, glaring into the darkness till it began turning round and round, ^{snatched} ~~my~~ ^{ed} ~~my~~ fingers ^{in horror} from where ~~we~~ ^I had planted them on the slimy body ^{of} ~~of~~ ^{an} old corpse (with rapidly beating hearts) nudging each other at the slightest noise or suspicion, crawling, watching, crawling, shamming dead under the blinding light of enemy flares and again crawling, watching, crawling. A ~~Second~~ ^{2nd} Battalion officer who revisited these Laventie trenches after the war was over told me of the ridiculously small area of No Man's Land compared with the size it seemed on the long painful journeys that ~~we~~ ^{he} made over it. "It was like the real size of the hollow in a tooth compared with the size it feels to the tongue."

We found a gap in the German wire and came at last to within five yards of the sap-head that was our objective. We waited quite twenty minutes listening for any signs of its occupation. Then I nudged Sergeant Townsend and, revolvers in hand, we wriggled quickly forward and slid into it. It was about three feet deep and unoccupied. On the floor were a few empty cartridges and a wicker basket containing something large and smooth and round, about the size of a football. Very, very carefully I groped and felt all around it in the dark. I couldn't guess what it was. I was afraid that it was some sort of infernal machine. Eventually I ~~dared~~ ^{dared} to lift it out and carry it back. I had ~~not~~ ^a ~~any~~ suspicion that it might be one of the German gas cylinders that we had heard so much about. We got back after making the journey of perhaps two hundred yards in rather more than two hours. The sentries passed along the word that we were in again. Our prize turned out to be a large glass container ^{quarter-} filled with some ^{pale yellow liquid.} This was sent down to battalion headquarters and from there sent along to the divisional intelligence-office. ^z Everybody was very interested in it. The theory was that the vessel contained a chemical for re-dampening gas-masks. I now believe it was the dregs of country wine mixed with rain-water. I never heard the official report. The colonel, however, told my company-commander in the hearing of ^{The Surrey-man:} "Your new wart seems to have more guts than the others." After this I went out fairly often. I found that the only thing that the regiment respected ^{in young officers} was personal courage.

Besides, I had worked it out like this. The best way of lasting the war out was to get wounded. The best time to get wounded was at night and in the open, because a wound in a vital spot was less likely. ^{fire} ~~Firing~~ was more or less unaimed at night and ^{whole} of the body was exposed. It was also convenient to be wounded when there was no rush on the dressing-station services and when the back-areas were not being ^{heavily} shelled. It was ^{most} convenient to be wounded, therefore, on a night-patrol in a quiet sector. You could usually manage to crawl into a shell-hole until somebody came to the rescue. Still, ^{had its} patrolling ^{peculiar risks} . If you were wounded and a German patrol got you they were as likely as not to cut your throat. The bowie-knife ^{At this time} was a favourite German patrol weapon: it was silent. (The British inclined more to the "cosh," a loaded stick.) The most important information that a patrol could bring back was to what regiment and division the troops opposite belonged. So if a wounded man was found and it was impossible to get him back without danger to oneself, the thing to be done was to strip him of his badges. To do that quickly and silently it might be necessary first to cut his throat or beat in his skull.

Mostyn, a lieutenant who was often out patrolling at Laventie, had a feud ^{on} with a German patrol on the left of the battalion frontage. ~~Our~~ ^{Our} patrols ~~usually~~ ^{consisted of} usually an officer and one or at the most, two men; German patrols were usually six or seven men under an N.C.O. German officers left as much as they decently could to their N.C.O.'s. They did not, as one of our sergeant-majors put it, believe in "keeping a dog and barking themselves.") (Mostyn ~~was~~ ^{caught sight of} One night ~~he~~ ^{one} he had raised himself on his knee to throw a percussion bomb at them when they fired and wounded him in the arm, which immediately went numb. He caught the bomb before it hit the ground and threw it with his left hand, and in the confusion that followed managed to return to the trench.

Like everyone else I had a carefully worked out formula for taking risks. We would all take any risk, even the certainty of death, to save life or to maintain an important position. To take life we would run, say, a one in five risk, particularly if there was some wider object than merely ~~reducing~~ ^{reducing} the enemy's man-power: for instance, picking off a well-known sniper, or getting fire ascendancy in trenches where the lines were dangerously close. I only once refrained from shooting a German I saw and that was at Guinchey about three weeks after this. When sniping from a knoll in the support line where we had a concealed loop-hole I saw a German, about seven hundred yards away, through my telescopic sights. He was having a bath in the German third line. I somehow did not like the idea of shooting a naked man, so I handed ^{the} ~~my~~ rifle to the sergeant who was with me and said "Here, take this. You're a better shot than me." He got him, he said, but I had not stayed to watch.

About saving the lives of enemy wounded there was disagreement; the convention varied with the division. Some divisions, like the Canadians and a division of Lowland territorials, who had, they claimed, atrocities to avenge would not only take no risks to rescue enemy wounded, but would go out of their way to finish them off. The Royal Welsh Fusiliers were gentlemanly: perhaps a one in twenty risk to get a wounded German to safety would be considered justifiable. An important factor in taking risks was ^{our} one's own physical condition. When exhausted and wanting to get quickly from one point in the trenches to another without collapse, and if the enemy were not nearer than ~~three or~~ ^{of five} four hundred yards, ~~we~~ ^{we} would sometimes take a short cut over the top. In a hurry ~~we~~ ^{we} would take a one in two hundred risk, when dead-tired a one in fifty risk. In some battalions where the morale was not high one in ~~five~~ ^{fifty} risks were often taken in mere laziness or despair. The Munsters in the First Division were said ~~to~~ ^{by} the Welsh to "waste men wicked" by not keeping properly under cover when in the reserve-lines. In the Royal Welch there was no wastage of this sort. At no time in the war did any of us allow ourselves to believe that ~~we~~ ^{hostilities} could possibly ~~last~~ ^{continue} more than ~~nine~~ ^{nayen} months ^{more}, so it seemed ^{al} most worth while taking care; there even seemed a ~~chance~~ ^{chance} of lasting until the end absolutely unhurt.

~~Some of the things possibly heard.~~

Royal Welch
The Second Battalion, unlike the Second Welsh, believed themselves better trench fighters than the Germans. With the Second Welsh it was not cowardice but modesty. With the Second Royal Welsh it was not vain-glory but courage: as soon as they arrived in a new sector they insisted on getting fire ascendancy. Having found out from the troops they relieved all possible information as to enemy snipers, machine-guns, and patrols, they set themselves to deal with them one by one. They began with machine-guns firing at night. As soon as one started traversing down a trench the whole platoon furthest removed from its fire would open five rounds rapid at it. The machine gun would usually stop suddenly but start again after a minute or two. Again five rounds rapid. Then it usually gave up.

The Welsh seldom answered a machine gun. If they did, it was not with local organized fire beginning and ending in unison, but in ragged confused protest all along the line. There was almost no firing at night in the Royal Welsh except organized fire at a machine gun or a persistent enemy sentry, or fire at a patrol close enough to be distinguished as a German one. With all other battalions I met in France there was random popping off all the time; the sentries wanted to show their spite against the war. Flares were rarely used in the Royal Welsh; ~~as signals~~ as signals to our patrols (most often) that it was time to come back.

As soon as enemy patrols guns had been discouraged our patrols would go out with bombs to claim possession of No Man's Land. At dawn next morning came the struggle for sniping ascendancy. The Germans, we were told, had special regimental snipers, trained in camouflaging themselves. I saw one killed once at Guiney who had been firing all day from a shell-hole between the lines. He had a sort of cape over his shoulders of imitation grass, his face was painted green and brown and his rifle was also green fringed. A number of empty cartridges were found by him, and his cap with the special oak-leaf badge. Few battalions attempted to get control of the sniping situation. The Germans had the advantage of having many times more telescopic sights than we did, and steel loop-holes that our bullets could not pierce. Also a system by which the snipers were kept months in the same sector until they knew all the loop-holes and shallow places in our trenches and the tracks that our ration-parties used above-ground by night, and where our traverses came in the trench, and so on, better than we did ourselves. British snipers changed their trenches, with their battalions, every week or two, and never had time to learn the German line thoroughly. But at least we counted on getting rid of the unprofessional German sniper. Later we had an elephant gun in the battalion that would pierce the German loop-holes, and if we could not locate the loop-hole of a persistent sniper we did what we could to dislodge him by a volley of rifle grenades or even by ringing up the artillery. It puzzled us that if a sniper were spotted and killed another sniper would begin again next day from the same position. The Germans probably underrated us and regarded it as an accident. The willingness of other battalions to let the Germans have sniping ascendancy helped us; enemy snipers often exposed themselves unnecessarily, even the professionals. There was, of course, one advantage of which no advance or retreat of the enemy could rob us and that was that we were always facing more or less East; dawn broke behind the German lines and they seldom realised that for several minutes every morning we could see them though still invisible ourselves. German night wiring-parties often stayed out too long, and we could get a man or two as they went back; sunsets were against us, but sunset was a less critical time. Sentries at night were made to stand with their head and shoulders above the trenches and their rifles in position on the parapet. This surprised me at first. But it meant greater vigilance and self-confidence in the sentry and it put the top of his head above the level of the parapet. Enemy-machine guns were trained on this level and it was safer to be hit in the chest or shoulders than in the top of the head. The risk of unaimed fire at night was negligible, so this was really the safest plan. It often happened in battalions like the Second Welsh, where the head and shoulder rule was not in force and the sentry just took a peep now and then, that an enemy patrol would sneak up unseen to the British wire, throw a few bombs and get safely back. In the Royal Welch the barbed-wire entanglement was the responsibility of the company behind it. One of our first acts of taking over trenches was to inspect and repair it. We did a lot of work on the wire.

~~Thomas~~ Thomas was an extremely silent man; it was not sullenness but shyness. "Yes" and "no" was the limit of his usual conversation; it was difficult for us subalterns. He never took us into his confidence about company affairs and we did not like asking him too much. His chief interests seemed to be polo and the regiment. He was most conscientious in taking his watch at night, a thing that the other company commanders did not always do. ~~His~~ ^{We enjoyed his} food-hampers sent every week from ~~Fortnum and Mason~~ ^(we messed by companies when in the trenches) Fortnum and Mason. ~~The only complaint~~ ^{Our only complaint} ~~was that~~ ^{Buzz off} ~~was that~~ ~~who~~ ^{Buzz off} ~~who~~ who had a good nose for a hamper, used to spend more time than he would otherwise have done in the company mess. This embarrassed us. Thomas went on leave to England about this time. I heard about it accidentally. He walked about the West End astonished at the amateur militariness that he met everywhere. To be more in keeping with it he gave elaborate awkward salutes to newly-joined second-lieutenants and raised his cap to dug-out colonels and generals. It was ~~private~~ ^{a private} joke ~~at the expense of the war~~ ^{at the expense of the war}.

I used to look forward to our spells in trenches at Laventie. Billet life meant battalion mess, also riding-school which I found rather worse than ~~The Surrey man~~ ^{The Surrey man} had described it.

Parades were carried out with peace-time punctiliousness and smartness, especially the daily battalion guard-changing which every now and then, when I was orderly officer, it was my duty to supervise. On one occasion, after the guard-changing ceremony and inspection were over and I was about to dismiss the old guard, I saw ^{Buzz OA} ~~the~~ cross the village street from one company headquarters to another. As he crossed I called the guard to attention and saluted. I waited for a few seconds and then dismissed the guard, but he had not really gone into the ^{billet} ~~house~~, he had been ^{waiting in the doorway} ~~waiting in the doorway~~. As soon as I dismissed the guard he dashed out with a great show of anger. "As you were, as you were, stand fast!" he shouted to the guard. And then to me "Why in hell's name, Mr. Graves, didn't you ask my permission to dismiss the parade? You've read the King's Regulations, haven't you? and where the devil are your manners, anyhow?" I apologised. I said that I thought he had gone into the house. This made matters worse. He bellowed at me for arguing; then he asked me where I had learned to salute. "At the Depot, sir," I answered. "Then, by Heaven, Mr. Graves, you'll have to learn to salute as the battalion does. You will parade every morning before breakfast for a month ^{Under} Staff-Sergeant Evans and do an hour's saluting drill." Then he turned to the guard and dismissed them himself. This was not a particular act of spite against me but the general game of "chasing the warts" at which all the senior officers played. It was honestly intended to make us better soldiers.

I had been with the Royal Welch about three weeks when the nineteenth brigade was moved down to the Béthune sector to fill up a gap in the Second Division; the gap was made by taking out the brigade of Guards to go into a Guards Division which was then being formed. On the way down we marched past Lord Kitchener. ^{we were told,} Kitchener commented to the Brigadier on the soldier-like ~~condition~~ of the leading battalion — which was ourselves, but ~~he~~ said cynically, "Wait until they've been a week or two in the trenches; they will lose some of that high polish." He apparently mistook us for one of the new-army battalions.

^{appearance}

The first trenches we went into on our arrival were the ^{Guinchy} Brick Stacks, ~~the~~ The Company I was with was on the ^C canal-bank frontage a few hundred yards to the left of where I had been with the Welsh Regiment at the end of May. The Germans opposite wished to be sociable. They sent messages over to us in undetonated rifle-grenades. One of these messages was evidently addressed to the Irish battalion we had relieved:

² We all German korporals wish you English korporals a good day and invite you to a good German dinner to-night with beer (ale) and cakes. Your little dog ran over to us and we keep it safe; it became no food with you so it run to us. Answer in the same way, if you please.

Another message was a copy of the Neueste Nachrichten, a German army newspaper printed at Lille. It gave sensational details of Russian defeats around Warsaw and immense captures of prisoners and guns. ^{But we} ~~we~~ were more interested in a full account in another column of the destruction of a German submarine by British armed trawlers: no details of the sinking of German submarines had been allowed to appear in any English papers. The battalion ^{carelessly} ~~was~~ ^{about} ~~the~~ ^{It is} ~~the~~ ^{did} ~~the~~ origins of the war. ~~we~~ ^{it} ~~the~~ successes or reverses of our Allies. ~~we~~ never allowed itself to have any ^{political} feelings about the Germans.

~~the~~. A professional soldier's job was to fight whomever the King ordered him to fight; it was as simple as that. With the King as Colonel-in-Chief of the regiment it was even simpler.

^e Guinchy was one of the worst places for rats. They came up from the canal and fed on the many corpses and multiplied ^{excessively} rapidly. When I ~~had been~~ ^{was} here with the Welsh a new officer ^{came} to the company and ^{as a token of} ~~the~~ welcome had been given a dug-out containing a spring-bed. When he turned

The Christmas 1914 fraternization in which the battalion was among the first to participate was of the same professional simplicity: it was not an emotional hiatus but a commonplace tradition — an exchange of courtesies between officers of opposing armies.

in that night he heard a scuffling, shone his torch on the bed, and there were two rats on his blankets tussling for the possession of a human hand. This was thought a great joke. ~~The colonel called for a patrol~~ ^{The colonel called for a patrol} to go out along the side of the tow-path, where we had heard suspicious sounds ^{on} the previous night, to see whether a working party was out. I volunteered to go when it was dark. But there was a moon that night so bright and full that it dazzled the eyes to look at it. Between us and the Germans was a flat stretch of about two hundred yards, broken only by shell-craters and an occasional patch of coarse grass. I was not with my own company but lent to "B" which had two officers away on leave. Childe-Freeman, the company commander, said; "You're not going out on patrol to-night are you? It's almost as bright as day." I said, "All the more reason for going; they won't be expecting me. Will you please have everything as usual? Let the men fire an occasional rifle and send up a flare every half hour. If I go carefully they'll not see me." But I was nervous and while we were having supper I clumsily knocked over a cup of tea and after that a plate. Freeman said "Look here, I'll 'phone through to battalion and tell them it's too bright for you to go out." But I knew ~~the colonel~~ ^{Buzz Off} would accuse me of "cold feet", so Sergeant Williams and I put on our crawlers and went out by way of a mine crater at the side of the tow-path. There was no need that ~~night~~ ^{at} of the usual staring business. We could see only too clearly. All we had to do was to wait for an opportunity to move quickly, ~~then~~ stop dead and trust to luck, then ~~move~~ move on quickly again. We planned our rushes from shell-hole to shell-hole; the opportunities were provided by artillery or machine gun fire which would distract the sentries. Many of the craters contained corpses of men who had been wounded and crept in and died. Some of them were skeletons, picked clean by the rats. We got to within thirty yards of a big German working party who were digging a trench ahead of their front line. Between them and us we could count a covering party of ten men lying on the grass in their great-coats. We had gone far enough. There was a German lying on his back about twelve yards away humming a tune. It was the Merry Widow waltz. The sergeant, who was behind me, pressed my foot with his hand and showed me the revolver he was carrying. He raised his eyebrows inquiringly. I gave him the signal for "no". We turned to go back; it was hard not to go back too quickly. We had got about half-way back when a German machine gun opened traversing fire along the top of our trenches. We immediately jumped to our feet; the bullets were brushing the grass so it was safer to be standing up. We walked the rest of the way back, but moving irregularly to distract the aim of the covering party if they saw us. Back in the trench I rang up the artillery and asked them to fire as much shrapnel as they could spare fifty yards short of ^{where} the German front trench touched the tow-path; I knew that one of the night-lines of the battery supporting us was trained near enough to this point. A minute and a quarter later the shells started coming over. We heard the clash of downed tools and distant shouts and cries; we reckoned the probable casualties. The next morning at ⁸/₁₀ stand-to ^{bugg off} came up to me. "I hear you were on patrol last night?" I said "Yes, sir." He asked me for particulars. When I had told him about the covering party he cursed me for "not scuppering them with that revolver of yours". "Cold feet," he snorted as he turned away.

One day while we were here with the Royal Welch were instructed to find a German-speaking officer to shout across to the enemy and induce them to take part in a conversation. The object was to find out how strongly the German front-trenches were manned at night. A German-speaking officer in the company among the Brick Stacks was provided with a megaphone. He shouted "Wie gehts ihnen, kamaraden?" Somebody shouted back in delight: "Ah, Tommee, hast du den deutsch gelernt?"

The firing stopped and a conversation began across the fifty yards or so of No Man's Land. The Germans refused to say what regiment they were. They would not talk any military shop. One of them shouted out "Les sheunes madamoiselles de La Bassée bonnés pour coucher avec. Les madamoiselles de Béthune bonne aussi, hein?" Our spokesman refused to discuss this. In the pause that followed he asked how the Kaiser was. They replied respectfully that he was in excellent health, thank you.
"And how is the Crown Prince?" he asked them. "Oh b----- the Crown Prince", shouted somebody ^{in English} and was immediately suppressed by his comrades. There was a confusion of angry voices and laughter. Then they all began singing the Wacht am Rhein.
The trench was evidently very well held indeed.

CHAPTER XIV.

This was the end of August and particulars of the coming offensive against La Bassée were beginning to leak through the young staff officers. The French civil ~~population~~^{ians} knew that it was coming and so ~~the~~^{naturally} did the Germans. Every night now new batteries and lorry-trains of shells came rumbling up the Béthune-La Bassée road. There were other signs of movement; sapping forward at Vermelles and Cambrin, where the lines were too far apart for a quick rush across, to make a new front line; orders for evacuation of hospitals; the appearance of ~~new~~^{and} army divisions ~~and~~ cavalry. Then Royal Engineer Officers supervised the digging of pits at intervals in the front line. They were sworn not to say what these were for; but we knew ~~that they were~~^{that they were} for gas-cylinders. As early as September 3rd I had a bet with Robertson that our division would attack on this Cambrin-Quinchey sector. When I went home on leave on ~~the~~ (9th September) the sense of impending events was so great that I almost wished I was not going back.

Leave came round for officers about every six or eight months in ordinary times; ~~the~~^{heavy} casualties shortened the period, ~~and~~ general offensives cut off leave altogether. There was only one officer in France who was ever said to have refused to go on leave when his turn came round. ~~He was~~ Cross of the 52nd Light Infantry, (~~the~~^{Second} ~~the~~ 2nd Battalion of the Oxford and Bucks Light Infantry, ~~the~~ ~~52nd Light Infantry~~ ~~was~~ ~~being~~ ~~linked~~ ~~with~~ ~~the~~ ~~43rd~~ ~~Light~~ ~~Infantry~~ ~~and~~ ~~was~~ ~~sent~~ ~~to~~ ~~Italy~~ ~~which~~ insisted on its original style as jealously as we kept our "c" in "Welch.") Cross is alleged to have refused leave on these grounds: "My father fought with the regiment in the South African war and had no leave; my grandfather fought in the Crimea with the regiment and had no leave. I do not regard it in the regimental tradition to take home-leave when on active service." Cross was a professional survivor and was commanding the battalion in 1917 when I last heard of him.

itself:
P London seemed unreal^y in spite of the number of men in uniform in the streets the general indifference to and ignorance about the war was remarkable. Enlistment was still voluntary. The universal catchword was "Business as usual". My family were living in London now at the house formerly occupied by my uncle Robert von Ranke, the German Consul. He had been forced to leave in a hurry on August 4th 1914, and my mother had undertaken to ~~look after~~^{look after} it for him while the war lasted. So when Edward Marshy ~~then secretary to the Prime Minister,~~ rang me up from Downing Street to arrange a meal, someone intervened and cut him off. The telephone of the German Consul's sister was of course closely watched by the anti-espionage men of Scotland Yard.

The Zeppelin scare had just begun, some friends of the family came in one night. They knew I ~~had been in the trenches~~ but were not interested. They began telling me of the air-raids, of bombs dropped only three streets off, so I said: "Well, do you know, the other day I was asleep in a house and in the early morning an aeroplane dropped a bomb next door and killed three soldiers who were billeted there, and a woman and child." "Good gracious," they said, looking at me with sudden interest, "What did you do then?" I said "I went to sleep again; I was tired out. It was at a place called Beuvry, about four miles behind the trenches." They said, "Oh, but that was in France" and the look of interest faded from their faces as though I had taken them in with a stupid catch. I went up to Harlech for the rest of my leave and walked about on the hills in an old shirt and a pair of shorts. When I got back "The Actor", a regular officer in "A" company asked me "Had a good time on leave?" I said "Yes." He said "Go to many dances?" I said "Not one." "What shows did you go to?" "I didn't go to any shows." "Hunt?" "No!" "Slept with any nice girls?" ^{No, I went.} "Sorry to disappoint you." ~~_____~~ "What the hell did you do, then?" "Oh, I just walked about on some hills." "Good God," he said, "chaps like you don't deserve to go on leave."

On September ^{19th} ~~the nineteenth~~ we relieved the Middlesex at Cambrin and were definitely told that these were the trenches from which we were to attack. The preliminary bombardment had already started, a week in advance. As I led my platoon into the line I recognised with some disgust the same machine-gun shelter where I had seen the suicide on my first night in trenches. ~~_____ I was still _____~~ ^{It seemed ominous.} ~~_____~~ ^{This} It was the first heavy bombardment that I had yet seen from our own guns. The trenches shook properly and a great cloud of drifting shell-smoke clouded the German trenches. The shells went over our heads in a steady stream; we had to shout to make our neighbours hear. Dying down a little at night, the noise began again every morning at dawn, a little louder each time. We said "Damn it, there can't be a living soul left in those trenches." And still it went on. The Germans retaliated, though not very vigorously. Most of their heavy artillery had been withdrawn from this sector, we were told, and sent across to the Russian front. We had more casualties from our own shorts and from blow-backs than from German shells. Much of the ammunition that our batteries were using came from America and contained a high percentage of duds; the driving-bands were always coming off. We had fifty casualties in the ranks and three officers, including ~~██████████~~ ^{Bugs Off} who was badly wounded in the head. This was before steel helmets were issued; we would not have lost nearly so many ^{if we had had them.} I had two insignificant wounds on the hand, which I took ~~as a sign of good luck~~ as an omen on the right side. On the morning of the ^{23rd} ~~twenty-third~~ Thomas came back from battalion headquarters with a notebook in his hand and a map for each of us company officers. "Listen," he said, "and copy out all this skite on the back of your maps. You'll have to explain it to your platoons this afternoon. To-morrow morning we go back to Béthune to dump our blankets, packs and great-coats. On the next day, that's Saturday, the ^{25th} ~~twenty-fifth~~, we attack." It was the first official news we had been given and we looked up half startled, half relieved. I still have the map and these are the orders as I copied them down:

First Objective. Les Briques Farm. The big house plainly visible to our front, surrounded by trees. To get this it is necessary to cross three lines of enemy trenches. The first is three hundred yards distant, the second four hundred, and the third about six hundred. We then cross two railways. Behind the second railway line is a German trench called the Brick Trench. Then comes the Farm, a strong place with moat and cellars and a kitchen garden strongly staked and wired.

Second Objective.

The Town of Auchy. This is also plainly visible from our trenches. It is four hundred yards beyond the Farm and defended by a first line of trench half-way across, and a second line immediately in front of the town. When we have occupied the first line our direction is half-right, with the left of the battalion directed on Tall Chimney.

Third Objective,

Village of Haisnes. Conspicuous by high spired church. Our eventual line will be taken up on the railway behind this village where we will dig in and await reinforcements.

When Thomas had reached this point the shoulders of "The Actor" were shaking with laughter. "What's up?", asked Thomas irritably. ^{The Actor asked:} "Who in God's name is originally responsible for this little effort?" ^{Thomas said:} "Don't know. Probably Paul the Pimp or someone like that". (Paul the Pimp was a Captain on the Divisional Staff, young and much disliked). "Between you and me, but you youngsters be careful not to let the men know, this is what they call a subsidiary attack. We'll have no supports. We've just got to go over and keep the enemy busy while the folk on our right do the real work. You notice that the bombardment is much heavier over there. They've knocked the Hohenzollern Redoubt to bits. Personally, I don't give a damn either way. We'll get killed anyhow." We all laughed. "All right, laugh now, but by God on Saturday we've got to carry out this funny scheme." I had never heard Thomas so talkative before. "Sorry," "The Actor" apologised, "carry on with the dictation." Thomas went on:-

²The attack will be preceded by forty minutes discharge of the accessory,* which will clear the path for a

* The gas-cylinders had by this time been put into position in the front line. A special order came round imposing severe penalties on anyone who used any word but "accessory" in speaking of the gas. This was to keep it secret, but the French civilians knew all about it long before ~~the battle~~ this.

thousand yards, so that the two railway lines will be occupied without difficulty. Our advance will follow closely behind the accessory. Behind us are three fresh divisions and the Cavalry Corps. It is expected we shall have no difficulty in breaking through. All men will parade with their platoons; pioneers, servants etc., to be warned. All platoons to be properly told off under N.C.O's. Every N.C.O. is to know exactly what is expected of him, and when to take over command in case of casualties. Men who lose touch must join up with the nearest company or regiment and push on. Owing to the strength of the accessory, men should be warned against remaining too long in captured trenches where the accessory is likely to collect, but to keep to the open and above all to push on. It is important that if smoke-helmets have to be pulled down they must be tucked in under the shirt."

The Actor interrupted again. "Tell me, Thomas, do you believe in this funny accessory?" Thomas said "It's damnable. It's not soldiering to use stuff like that even though the Germans did start it. It's dirty and it'll bring us bad luck. We're sure to bungle it. Look at those new Gas-companies, (sorry, excuse me this once, I mean Accessory-companies). Their very look ~~is~~ makes me tremble. Chemistry-dons from London University, a few lads straight from school, one or two N.C.O's. of the old-soldier type trained together for three weeks, then given a job as responsible as this. Of course they'll bungle it. How could they do anything else? But let's be merry. I'm going on again:

Men of Company: What they are to carry:-

200 rounds of ammunition (bombthrowers 50, and signallers 150 rounds).

Heavy tools carried in sling by the strongest men.

Waterproof sheet in belt.

Sandbag in right coat-pocket.

Field dressing and iodine.

Emergency ration, including biscuit.

1 tube-helmet to be worn when we advance, rolled up on the head. It must be quite secure and the top part turned down. If possible each man will be provided with an elastic band.

Inset

Gas-smoke-helmet, old pattern, to be carried for preference behind the back where it is least likely to be damaged by stray bullets, etc.

Wire cutters, as many as possible, by wiring party and others: hedging-gloves by wire party.

Platoon screens, for artillery observation, to be carried by a man in each platoon who is not carrying a tool.

Packs, caps, ²great-coats, blankets will be dumped, not carried.

No one is to carry sketches of our position or anything likely to be of service to the enemy.²

"That's all. I believe we're going over first with the Middlesex in support. If we get through the German wire I'll be satisfied. Our guns don't seem to be cutting it. Perhaps they're putting ~~it~~ ^{that} off until the intense bombardment. Any questions?"

That afternoon I repeated it all to the platoon and told them of the inevitable success attending our assault. They seemed to believe it. All except Sergeant Townsend. "Do you say, sir, that we have three divisions and ^{the} Cavalry Corps behind us?" he asked. "Yes," I answered. "Well, excuse me, sir, I'm thinking it's only those chaps on the right that'll get reinforcements. If we get half a platoon of Mons Angels, that's about all we will get." "Sergeant Townsend," I said, "you are a well-known pessimist. This is going to be a good show." The next morning we were relieved by the Middlesex and marched back to Bethune where we dumped our spare kit at the Montmorency Barracks. The battalion officers messed together in a big house near by. This billet was claimed at the same time by the staff of a new-army division which was to take part in the fighting next day. The argument was settled in a friendly way by division and battalion messing together. It was ^{someone pointed out,} like a ~~caricature~~ caricature of The Last Supper. ^{in duplicate} In the middle of the long table sat the two pseudo-Christ, the battalion colonel and the divisional general.

Everybody was drinking a lot; the subalterns were allowed whisky for a treat and were getting rowdy. They raised their glasses with "Cheero, we will be messing together to-morrow night in La Bassée." Only the company commanders were looking worried. I remember C. company commander especially, Captain Sampson, biting his thumb and refusing to join in the general excitement. ^{I think it was} Childe-Freeman of B. company ~~was the same.~~ ~~think it was Freeman~~ who said that night; "The last time the regiment was in these parts it was under decent generalship. Old Marlborough knew better than to attack the La Bassée lines; he masked them and went round."

1/ The G.S.O.I. of the new-army division, a staff-colonel, knew the adjutant well. They had played polo together in 1/ India. I happened to be sitting next to them. The G.S.O.I. said to the adjutant rather drunkenly; "Charley, do you see that silly old woman over there? Calls himself General Commanding. Doesn't know where he is; doesn't know where his division is; can't read a map properly; He's marched the poor sods off their feet and left his supplies behind, God knows where. They've had to use their iron-rations and what they could pick up in the villages. And to-morrow he's going to fight a battle. Doesn't know anything about battles; the men have never been in trenches before, and to-morrow's going to be a glorious balls-up and the day after to-morrow he'll be sent home." Then he said quite seriously, "Really, Charley, it's just like that." you mark my words.

That night we marched back again to Cambrin. The men were singing. Being mostly from the Midlands they sang comic songs instead of Welsh hymns: "Slippery Sam", "When we've Wound up the Watch on the Rhine" and "I do like a S'nice Mince Pie" to concertina accompaniment. The tune of the S'nice Mince Pie ran in my head all next day, and for the week following I could not get rid of it. The Second Welsh would never have sung a song like "When We've Wound up the Watch on the Rhine". Their only songs about the war were defeatist:-

I want to go home,
I want to go home,
The coal-box and shrapnel they whistle and roar,
I don't want to go to the trenches no more,
I want to go over the sea
Where the Kayser can't shot bombs at me.
Oh, I,
Don't want to die,
I want to go home.

There were several more verses in the same strain. Hewitt, the Welsh machine-gun officer had written one in a more offensive spirit:-

I want to go home,
I want to go home.
One day at Givenchy the week before last
The Allmands attacke d and they nearly got past.
They pushed their way up to the Keep,
Through our Maxim-gun sights we did peep, Oh my!
They let out a cry,
They never got home.

But the men would not sing it, though they all admired Hewitt.

The Bethune-La Bassée road was choked with troops, guns and transport and we had to march miles north out of our way to get back to Cambrin. As it was we were held up two or three times by masses ~~of~~ cavalry. Everything seemed in confusion. A casualty clearing-station had been planted astride one of the principal cross-roads and was already being shelled. When we reached Cambrin we had marched about twenty miles in all that day. We were told then that the Middlesex would go over first with us in support, and to their left the Second Argill and Sutherland Highlanders with the Cameronians in support; the junior officers complained loudly at our not being given the honour of leading the attack. We were the senior regiment, ^{and entitled to the Right of the Line!} they protested. We moved into trench sidings just in front of the village. There was about half a mile of communication trench between us and the trenches proper, known as Maison Rouge Alley. It was an hour or so past midnight. At half-past five the gas was to be discharged. We were cold, tired and sick, not at all in the mood for a battle. We tried to snatch an hour or two of sleep squatting in the trench. It had been raining for some time. Grey watery dawn broke at last behind the German lines; the bombardment, which had been surprisingly slack all night, brisked up a little. "Why the devil don't they send them over quicker?" asked the Actor. "This isn't my idea of a bombardment. We're getting nothing opposite us, ~~there~~ ^{What little} there is, ~~is~~ ^{is going} into the Hohenzollern." "Shell shortage. Expected it," answered Thomas. We were told afterwards that on the ~~twenty-third~~ ^{23rd} a German aeroplane had bombed the Army ~~reserve~~ ^{reserve} shell-dump and sent it up. The bombardment on the ~~twenty-fourth~~ ^{24th} and on the day of the battle itself was nothing compared with that of the previous days. Thomas looked strained and ill. "It's time they were sending that damned accessory off. I wonder what's doing."

What happened in the next few minutes is difficult for me now to sort out. It was more difficult still at the time. All we heard back there in the sidings was a distant cheer, confused crackle of rifle fire, yells, heavy shelling on our front line, more shouts and yells and a continuous rattle of machine guns. After a few minutes lightly wounded men of the Middlesex came ~~staggering~~ ^{stumbling} down Maison Rouge Alley to the dressing-station. I was at the junction of the siding and the Alley. "What's happened? What's happened?" I asked. "Bloody balls-up" was the most detailed answer I could get. Among the wounded were a number of men yellow-faced and choking ~~and~~ ^{with} their buttons tarnished green; these were gas-cases. Then came the stretcher-cases: Maison Rouge Alley was narrow and the stretchers had difficulty in getting down. The Germans started shelling it with five-point-nines. Thomas went through the shelling to battalion headquarters to ask for orders: it was the same place that I had visited on my first night in the trenches. This group of dug-outs in the reserve line showed very plainly from the air as battalion headquarters and should never have been occupied on the day of a battle. Just before Thomas arrived the Germans put five shells into it. The adjutant jumped one way, the colonel another, the regimental sergeant-major a third. One shell went into the Signals dug-out and destroyed the telephone. ~~The shock of the explosion~~ ~~we~~

~~and the colonel~~ ^{The colonel} had a slight ^{wound on} ~~cut in~~ his hand; he joined the stream of wounded and was ^{was carried as far as} ~~carried~~ ^{with it.} ~~to the Base before he reached the~~ ~~base~~. The adjutant took charge. All this time A Company had been waiting in the siding for the rum to arrive; the tradition of every attack was a double tot of rum beforehand. All the other companies got it except ours. The Actor was cursing "Where the bloody hell's that storeman gone?" We fixed bayonets in readiness to go up to the attack as soon as Thomas came back with orders. The Actor sent me along the siding to the other end of the company. The stream of wounded was continuous. At last Thomas's orderly appeared, saying "Captain's orders, sir, A. Company to move up to the front line." It seems that at that moment the storeman appeared with the rum. He was hugging the rum-bottle, without rifle or equipment, red-faced and retching. He staggered up to The Actor and said "There you are, sir," then fell on his face in the thick mud of a sump pit at the junction of the trench and the siding. The stopper of the bottle flew out and what was left of the three gallons bubbled out. The Actor said nothing. It was a crime deserving the death-penalty. He put one foot on the storeman's neck, the other in the small of his back and trod him into the mud. Then he gave the order "Company forward." The company went forward with a clatter of steel and that was the last that ~~heard~~ ^{I heard} of the storeman. They trod ~~him~~ ^{him} into the mud.

What had happened in the front line was this. At half-past four the commander of the gas-company in the front line sent a telephone message through to divisional headquarters. "Dead calm. Impossible discharge accessory." The answer came back, "Accessory to be discharged at all costs." Thomas's estimate of the gas-company's efficiency was right enough. The spanners for unscrewing the cocks of the cylinders were found, with two or three exceptions, to be misfits. The gas men rushed about shouting and asking each other for the loan of an adjustable spanner. They discharged one or two cylinders with the spanners that they had; the gas went whistling out, formed a thick cloud a few yards away in No Man's Land and then gradually spread back into the trenches. The Germans had been expecting the attack. They immediately put their gas helmets on, semi-rigid ones, better than ~~the British~~ ^{ours}. Then their batteries opened on our lines. The confusion in the front trench was great; the shelling broke several of the gas-cylinders and the trench was soon full of gas. The gas-company dispersed. ~~Nobody knew what~~ ~~happened~~. No orders could come through because the shell in the Signals dug-out at battalion headquarters had cut communication both between companies and battalion headquarters and between battalion headquarters and division. The officers in the front trench had to decide on immediate action. Two companies of the Middlesex, instead of waiting for the intense bombardment which was to follow the forty minutes of gas, charged at once and got as far as the German wire, which our artillery had ~~failed~~ ^{not yet attempted} to cut. What shelling there had been had been shrapnel and not high explosive; shrapnel was no use against barbed wire. The Germans shot ~~them~~ ^{the Middlesexmen} down. It is said that one Middlesex platoon found a gap and got into the German trench. But there were no survivors of the platoon to confirm the story. The Argyll and Sutherland Highlanders went over too, on their left. Two companies, instead of charging at once, rushed back to the support line out of the gas-filled front trench and attacked from there. It will be recalled that the front line had been pushed forward in preparation for the battle; ~~these~~ these companies were therefore attacking from the old front line. The barbed wire entanglements in front of the trench had not been removed so that they were ~~caught~~ ^{caught} and machine-gunned between their own front and support lines. The leading companies were equally unsuccessful. When the attack started the German N.C.O's had jumped up on the parapet to encourage their men. ^{Another musketry was good} It was a Jaeger regiment. ^{The survivors} ~~What was left~~ of the first two companies of the Middlesex were lying in shell craters close to the German wire, sniping and making the Germans keep their heads down. They had bombs to throw but these were nearly all of a new type issued for the battle; the fuses were lit on the match and match-box principle and the rain had made them useless. The other two companies of the Middlesex soon followed in support. Machine-gun fire stopped them half way. Only one German machine gun was now in action, the others had been knocked out by rifle or trench-mortar fire. Why the single gun remained in action is a story in itself.

It starts like this. British Colonial Governors and High Commissioners had ~~the~~ the privilege of ~~nominating~~ nominating one or two officers from their countries to be attached in war-time to the regular British forces. Under this scheme the officers appointed began as full-lieutenants. The Governor General of Jamaica (or whatever his proper style may be) ~~had~~ nominated the eighteen-year old son of a rich Jamaica planter. He ~~had~~ ^{was} sent straight from Jamaica to the First Middlesex. He was good-hearted enough but of little use in the trenches. He had never been out of the island in his life and, except for a short service with the West Indian militia, knew nothing of soldiering. His company commander took a fatherly interest in "Young Jamaica", ^{as he was called,} and tried to teach him his duties. This company commander was known as "The Boy". He had ~~had~~ twenty years service in the Middlesex and the unusual ^{boast} ~~experience~~ of having held every rank from "boy" to captain in the same company. His father, I believe, had been the regimental sergeant-major. The difficulty was that Jamaica was a full lieutenant and so senior to the other experienced subalterns in the company who were only second-lieutenants. The Colonel decided to shift Jamaica off on some course or extra regimental appointment at the earliest opportunity. Somewhere about May or June he had been asked to supply an officer for the brigade trench-mortar company and he had sent Jamaica. Trench-mortars at that time were dangerous and ineffective; so the appointment seemed suitable. At the same time the Royal Welch Fusiliers had been also asked to detail an officer and the ^C Colonel had sent Tiley, an ex-planter from Malay, who was what ^{is called} they call a fine natural soldier. He had been chosen because he was ^{attached from another regiment} ~~and had showed his resentment at the manner of his welcome somewhat too plainly. By September mortars had improved in design and become a ^{an important} ~~serious~~ infantry-arm; Jamaica was senior to Tiley and was therefore in the responsible position of commanding the company.~~

When the Middlesex made the charge, "The Boy" was mortally wounded as he climbed ^{over} ~~up~~ on the parapet. He fell back and began crawling down the trench to the stretcher-bearer's dug-out. He passed Jamaica's trench-mortar emplacement. Jamaica had lost his gun team and was serving the trench-mortars himself.

When he saw "The Boy" he forgot about his guns and ran off to get a stretcher party. Tiley meanwhile on the other flank had knocked out the machine-guns within range. He went on until his guns burst. The machine-gun opposite Jamaica remained in action.

It was at this point that the Royal Welch Fusiliers came up in support. Maison Rouge Alley was a nightmare; the Germans were shelling it with ~~six-inch~~^{five-nine} shells bursting with a black smoke and ~~with~~ with lachrimatory shells. This caused a continual scramble backwards and forwards. There were cries and counter-cries "Come on!" "Get back, you ~~bastards~~^{bastards}!" "Gas turning on us!" "Keep your heads, you men!" "Back like hell, boys." "Whose orders?" "What's happening?" "Back!" "Come on!" "Gas!" "Back!" Wounded men and stretcher bearers were still trying to squeeze past. We were alternately putting on and taking off our gas-helmets and that made things worse. In many places the trench was filled in and we had to scramble over the top. Chilc-Freeman B. company ~~company~~ got up to the front line with only fifty men; the rest had lost their way in some abandoned trenches half-way up. The adjutant met him in the support line. "You ready to go over, Freeman?" he asked. Freeman had to admit that he had lost most of his company. ~~He~~^{He} felt ~~his~~^{this} keenly as a disgrace; it was the first time that he had commanded a company in battle. He decided to go over with his fifty men in support of the Middlesex. He blew his whistle and the company charged. They were stopped by machine-gun fire before they had passed our own entanglements. Freeman himself died, but of heart-failure, as he stood on the parapet. After a few minutes C. company and the remainder of B. reached the front line. The gas cylinders were still whistling and the trench full of dying men. Sampson decided to go over; he would not have it said that the Royal Welch had let down the Middlesex. There was a strong comradely feeling between the Middlesex and the Royal Welch; ^{brigade} The other three battalions in the division were Scottish, and the Royal Welch and Middlesex were drawn together in dislike of the Scots: the brigadier was a Scot and ^{unjustly no doubt,} accused of favouring them. ~~The~~ ^{Our} adjutant voiced the general opinion: "The Jocks are all the same, the trousered variety and the bare-arse variety. They're dirty in trenches, they skite too much, and they ~~with~~ ^{charge} like hell—both ways." The Middlesex, who were the original Die-hard Battalion, had more than once, with the Royal Welch, considered ~~that they were~~ ^{themselves} let down by the Jocks. So Sam ^{with C.} and the rest of B. company charged. One of the officers told me later what happened to himself. It had been agreed to advance by platoon rushes with supporting fire. When his platoon had run about twenty yards he signalled them to lie down and open covering fire. The din was tremendous. He saw the platoon on the left flopping down too, so he whistled the advance again. Nobody seemed to hear. He jumped up from his shell-hole and waved and signalled "Forward". Nobody stirred. He shouted "You bloody cowards, are you leaving me to go on alone?" His platoon sergeant, groaning with a broken shoulder, gasped out: "Not cowards, sir. Willing enough. But they're all f—ng dead." A machine gun traversing had caught them ~~at~~ as they rose to the whistle.

187

Our company too had become separated by the shelling.

~~The Surrey man~~ ^{The Surrey man} got a touch of gas and went coughing back. The Actor said he was skrim-shanking and didn't want the battle. This was unfair. ~~He~~ ^{not} looked properly sick. I don't know what happened to him but I heard that the gas was not much and that he managed ^{a few} months later to get back to his own regiment in France.

I found myself with The Actor in a narrow trench between the front and support lines. This trench had not been built wide enough for a stretcher to pass the bends. We came on "The Boy" lying on his stretcher wounded in the lungs and the stomach. Jamaica was standing over him in tears blubbering: "Poor old Boy, poor old Boy, he's going to die, I'm sure he is. He's the only one who was decent to me." The Actor found we could not get by. He said to Jamaica: "Take that poor sod out of the way will you? I've got to get my company up. Put him into a dug-out or somewhere." Jamaica made no answer; he seemed paralysed by the horror of the occasion. He could only repeat "Poor old Boy, poor old Boy." "Look here," said The Actor, "if you can't shift him into a dug-out we'll have to lift him on top of the trench. He can't live now and we're late getting up." "No, no," Jamaica shouted wildly. The Actor lost his temper and shook Jamaica roughly by the shoulders. "You're the bloody trench-mortar wallah, aren't you?" he asked fiercely. Jamaica nodded miserably. "Well, your battery is a hundred yards from here. Why the hell aren't you using your gas-pipes on that machine-gun in the crater? Buzz off back to them." And he kicked him down the trench. Then he called over his shoulder; "Sergeant Rose and Corporal Jennings, lift this stretcher up across the top of the trench. We've got to pass." Jamaica leaned against a traverse. "I do think you're the most heartless beast I've ever met," he said weakly.

We went on up to the front line. It was full of dead and dying. The captain of the gas-company, who had kept his head and had a special oxygen respirator, had by now turned off the gas. Vermorel-sprayers had cleared out most of the gas, but we still had to wear our masks, ~~and I was~~

~~and I was~~ ~~and I was~~ ~~and I was~~ ~~and I was~~ ~~and I was~~. We climbed up ^{and crouched} on the fire-step where the gas was not so thick — gas was heavy stuff and kept low. Then ^{Thomas} the remainder of ~~the A.~~ company arrived and ^{with D.} we waited for the whistle to follow the other two companies over. Fortunately at this moment the adjutant appeared. He told Thomas that he was now in command ^{of the battalion} and he didn't care a damn about orders; he was going to cut his losses. He said he would not send ^{over} ~~over~~ A. and D. ~~companies~~ until he got definite orders from brigade. He had sent a runner back, because telephone communication was cut, and we must wait. Meanwhile the intense bombardment that was to follow the forty minutes discharge of gas began. It concentrated on the German front trench and wire. A good deal of it was short and we had further casualties in our trenches. The survivors of the Middlesex and of our B. and C. companies in craters in No Man's Land suffered heavily.

My mouth was dry, my eyes out of focus and my legs quaking under me. I found a water-bottle full of rum and drank about half a pint: it quieted me and my head remained clear. Samson was lying wounded about twenty yards away from the front trench. Several attempts were made to get him in. He was very badly hit and groaning. Three men were killed in these attempts and two officers and two men wounded. Finally his own orderly managed to crawl out to him. Samson ordered him back saying that he was riddled and not worth rescuing; he sent his apologies to the company for making such a noise. We waited for about a couple of hours for the order to charge. The men were silent and depressed. Sergeant Townsend was making feeble bitter jokes about the Good Old British Army muddling through and how he thanked God we still had a Navy. I shared the rest of the rum with him and he cheered up a little. Finally a runner came with a message that the attack was off for the present.

Rumours came down the trenches of a disaster similar to our own in the Brick Stack area, where the Fifth brigade had gone over, and again at Givenchy where it was said that men of the Sixth brigade at the Duck's Bill salient had fought their way into the enemy trenches but had been bombed out, their own supply of bombs failing. It was said, however, that things were better on the right where there had been a slight wind to take the gas over. There was a rumour that the 1st, 7th, and 47th Divisions had broken through. My memory of that day is hazy. We spent it getting the wounded down to the dressing-station, spraying the trenches must wait. Meanwhile the intense bombardment that was to follow the forty minutes discharge of gas began. It concentrated on the German front trench and wire. A good deal of it was short and we had further casualties in our trenches. The survivors of the Middlesex and of our B. and C. companies in craters in No Man's Land suffered heavily.

My mouth was dry, my eyes out of focus and my legs ~~shaking~~ ^{quaking} under me.
I had found a water-bottle full of rum and drank about half a pint ~~on an empty stomach~~: it quieted me and my head remained clear. Sampson was lying wounded about twenty yards away from the front trench. Several attempts were made to get ^{him} his body in. He was very badly hit and groaning. Three men were killed in these attempts and ~~one~~ ^{two} officers and two men wounded. Finally his own orderly managed to crawl out to him. Sampson ~~sent~~ ^{ordered} him back ~~saying~~ ^{to saying} that he was ~~done for~~ ^{not worth rescuing}; he ~~asked him to apologize~~ ^{sent his apologies} to the ^C company for making such a noise. We waited for about a couple of hours for the order to charge. ~~The men were silent and~~ ^{the men were silent and} ~~the attack was off for the present.~~ ^{the attack was off for the present.}

Townsend

was ~~making~~ ^{making} little bitter jokes about the food and the Army and how he thanked God we still had a Navy. I shared the rum with him and he cheered up a little. Finally ~~the~~ ^{the} rum came with a message

Rumours
News came down our trenches of a similar disaster to our own in the Brick-stack area, where the Fifth brigade had gone over, and again at Givenchy where it was said that ^{men of} the Sixth brigade at the Duck's Bill salient had fought their way into the enemy trenches but had been bombed out, their own supply of bombs failing. It was said, however, that things were better off the right where there had been a slight wind to take the gas over. ~~There was a rumour~~ ^{There was a rumour} that the 1st, 7th, and 47th Divisions had broken through.

My memory of that day is very hazy. We spent it getting the wounded down to the dressing-station, spraying the trenches and dug-outs to get rid of the gas and clearing away the earth where trenches were blocked. The trenches stank with a gas-blood-lyddite-latrine smell. Late in the afternoon we watched through our field-glasses the advance of the reserves towards Loos and Hill 70; ~~It was clear~~ ^{it} It looked like a real break through. They were being heavily shelled. They were troops of the new-army division whose staff we had messed with the night before. Immediately to the right of us was the Highland division whose exploits on that day Ian Hay ^{had} ^{two} in ^{the} of ^{one} Hundred Thousand.

suppose that we were "the flat caps on the left" who "let down" his comrades-in-arms.

As soon as it was dusk we all went out to get in the wounded. Only sentries were left in the line. The first dead body I came upon was Sampson's. I found that he had put his hand in his mouth to stop himself crying out and attracting any more ^{men} people to their death. ^{He had been hit in several places.} Major Swainson, the second-in-command of the Middlesex, came crawling in from the German wire. He seemed to be wounded in the lungs, the stomach and a leg. Choate, a Middlesex second-lieutenant appeared; he was unhurt, and together we bandaged Swainson and got him into the trench and on a stretcher. He begged me to loosen his belt; I cut it with a bowie-knife that I had bought in Bethune for use in the fighting. He said "I'm about done for."* We spent all that night getting in the wounded of our ^{Royal Welch} own regiment, the Middlesex and those of the Argyle and Sutherland who had attacked from the front trench. The Germans behaved ^{generously} well. I don't ^{not} remember hearing a shot fired that night and we kept on until it was ^{nearly} dawn and we could be ~~quite~~ plainly seen; then they fired a few shots in warning and we gave ^{up}. By this time we had got in all the wounded and most of the Royal Welch dead. I was surprised at ^{some of} ~~the~~ ^{attitudes} ~~in~~ which the dead had stiffened ^{- in the act of} bandaging friends' wounds, crawling, cutting wire. The Argyle and Sutherland had seven hundred casualties, including fourteen officers killed out of the sixteen that went over; the Middlesex five hundred and fifty casualties, including eleven officers killed.

^{Two other} ~~The~~ ^{besides Choate} Middlesex officers ~~were~~ ^{were} unwounded; their names were Henry and Hill, second-lieutenants who had recently come and dug-outs to get rid of the gas and clearing away the earth where trenches were blocked. The trenches stank with a gas-blood-lyddite-latrine smell. Late in the afternoon we watched through our field-glasses the advance of the reserves towards Loos and Hill 70; it looked like a real break through. They were being heavily shelled. They were troops of the new-army division whose staff we had messed with the night before. Immediately to the right of us was the Highland division whose exploits on that day Ian Hay has celebrated in The First Hundred Thousand; I suppose that we were "the flat caps on the left" who "let down" his comrades-in-arms.

* Major Swainson recovered quickly and was back at ^{The} Middlesex Depot ~~about three months later.~~ ^{after a few weeks} On the other hand dawson, a Royal Welch company quartermaster-sergeant back at Cambrai, ^{was} ~~was~~ hit in the neck that day by a spot machine gun ~~bullet~~ ^{bullet} which ~~just pierced the skin~~ ^{just pierced the skin} and ~~of shock a few hours later.~~ ^{of shock a few hours later.}

As soon as it was dusk we all went out to get in the wounded. Only sentries were left in the line. The first dead body I came upon was Samson's. I found that he had put ^{knuckles into} his hand in his mouth to stop himself crying out and attracting any more men to their death. He had been hit in seventeen places. Major Swainson, the second-in-command of the Middlesex, came crawling in from the German wire. He seemed to be wounded in the lungs, the stomach and a leg. Choate, a Middlesex second-lieutenant appeared; he was unhurt, and together we bandaged Swainson and got him into the trench and on a stretcher. He begged me to loosen his belt; I cut it with a bowie-knife that I had bought in Béthune for use in the fighting. He said, "I'm about done for." * We spent all that night getting in the wounded of the Royal Welch, the Middlesex and those of the Argyll and Sutherland who had attacked from the front trench. The Germans behaved generously. I do not remember hearing a shot fired that night and we kept on until it was nearly dawn and we could be plainly seen; then they fired a few shots in warning and we gave it up. By this time we had got in all the wounded and most of the Royal Welch dead. I was surprised at some of the attitudes in which the dead had stiffened— in the act of bandaging friends' wounds, crawling, cutting wire. The Argyll and Sutherland had seven hundred casualties, including fourteen officers killed out of the sixteen that went over; the Middlesex five hundred and fifty casualties, including eleven officers killed.

Two other Middlesex officers besides Choate were unwounded; their names were Henry and Hill, second-lieutenants who had recently come

* Major Swainson recovered quickly and was back at the Middlesex Depot after a few weeks. On the other hand Lawrie, a Royal Welch company quartermaster-sergeant back at Cambrin, was hit in the neck that day by a spent machine-gun bullet which just pierced the skin and died of shock a few hours later.

with commissions from, I think, the Artists' Rifles; their welcome in the Middlesex had been something like mine in the Royal Welch. They had been lying out in shell-holes in the rain all day, sniping and being sniped at. Henry, according to Hill, had dragged five wounded men into his shell-hole and thrown up a sort of parapet with his hands and a bowie knife that he was carrying. Hill had his platoon sergeant with him screaming for hours with a stomach wound, begging for morphia; he was dying, so Hill gave him five pellets. We always carried morphia with us for emergencies like this. When ^{Choate, Henry & Hill} [redacted] arrived back in the trenches with a few stragglers they reported at the Middlesex headquarters. Hill told me the story. The colonel and the adjutant were sitting down to a meat-pie when he and Henry arrived. Henry said, "Come to report, sir. Ourselves and about ninety men of all companies. Mr. Choate is back unwounded too." They looked up dully. The colonel said: "So you've come back, have you? Well, all the rest are dead. I suppose Mr. Choate had better command what's left of A. company, the bombing officer will command what's left of B. (the bombing officer had not gone over but remained with headquarters), Mr. Henry goes to C. company, Mr. Hill to D. The Royal Welch are holding the front line. We are here in support. Let me know where to find you if I want you. Goodnight." There was no offer to have a piece of meat-pie, or a drink of whisky, so they saluted and went miserably out. They were called back by the adjutant. "Mr. Hill! Mr. Henry!" "Sir?". Hill said that he expected a change of mind, as to the ^{propriety with which} hospitality ~~that could with propriety~~ be offered by a regular colonel and adjutant to temporary second-lieutenants in distress. But it was only to say: "Mr. Hill, Mr. Henry, I saw some men in the trench just now with their shoulder-straps unbuttoned and their equipment fastened anyhow. See that this practice does not occur in future. That's all." Henry heard the colonel from his bunk complaining that he had only two blankets and that it was a deucedly cold night. Choate arrived a few minutes later and reported; the others had told him of their reception. After he had saluted and reported that Major Swainson, who had been thought killed, was wounded~~x~~ and on the way down to the dressing station, he leaned over the table, cut a large piece of meat-pie and began eating it. This caused such surprise that nothing further was said. He finished his meat pie and drank a glass of whisky, saluted and joined the others.

Meanwhile I had been given command of the survivors of B. company. There were only six company officers left in the Royal Welch. Next morning there were only five. Thomas was killed by a sniper. He was despondently watching the return of the new-army troops on the right. They had been pushed blindly into the gap made by the advance of the Seventh and Forty-Seventh divisions ^{on} the previous afternoon; they didn't know where they were or what they were supposed to do; their ration supply had broken down. So they flocked back, not in a panic, but stupidly like a crowd coming back from a Cup Final. Shrapnel was bursting above them. We noticed that officers were in groups of their own. We could scarcely believe our eyes, it was so odd. Thomas need not have been killed; but he was in the sort of mood in which he ^{seemed not to} care one way or ^{the} other. The Actor took command of A. ^{company} We lumped our companies together after a couple of days for the sake of relieving each other on night watch and getting some sleep. The first night I agreed to ^{take} the first watch, ^{ing} wake him up at midnight. When I went to call him ^{not} I couldn't wake him up; I tried everything. I shook him, shouted in his ear, poured water over him, banged his head against the side of the bed. Finally I threw him on the floor. I was desperate for want of sleep myself, but he was in the state of sleep from which nothing could shake him, so I heaved him back on the bunk and had to finish the night out myself. Even "Stand to" failed to ~~wake~~^{arouse} him. I woke him at last at nine o'clock in the morning and he was furious with me for not having waked him at midnight.

The day after the attack we spent carrying the dead down to burial and cleaning the trench up as well as we could. That night the Middlesex held the line while the Royal Welch carried all the unbroken gas-cylinders along to a position on the left flank of the brigade where they were to be used on the following night, September the 27th. This was worse than carrying the dead; the cylinders were cast iron and very heavy and we hated them. The men cursed and joked but got the carrying done. Orders came that we were to attack again. Only the officers knew; the men were only to be told just beforehand. It was difficult for me to keep up appearances with the men: I felt like screaming. It was still raining, harder than ever. We knew definitely this time that ours was only a subsidiary night attack, a diversion to help a division on our right to make the real attack. The scheme was the same as before. At four p.m. the gas was to be discharged again for forty minutes, then came a quarter of an hour's bombardment, and then the attack. I broke the news to the men about three o'clock. They took it very well. The relation of officers and men, and of senior and junior officers, had been very different in the excitement of the attack. There had been no insubordination but a greater freedom, as if everyone was drunk together. I found myself calling the adjutant Charley on one occasion; he appeared not to mind it in the least. For the next ten days my relations with my ~~men~~^{men} were ~~like those that I had~~^{like those that I had} had ~~with~~ with the Welsh Regiment; later discipline reasserted itself and it was only occasionally that I found them intimate.

At four p.m. then the gas went off again. There was a strong wind and it went over well; the gasmen had brought enough spanners this time. The Germans were absolutely silent. Flares went up from the reserve lines and it seemed as though all the men in the front line were dead. The brigadier decided not to take too much for granted; after the bombardment he sent out twenty-five men and an officer of the Cameronians as a feeling-patrol. The patrol reached the German wire. There was a burst of machine-gun and rifle fire and only two wounded men regained the trench. We waited on the firestep from four to nine o'clock, with fixed bayonets, for the order to go over. The sergeant who was acting company-sergeant-major said to me, "It's murder, sir." "Of course it's murder, you bloody fool," I agreed. "But there's nothing else for it, is there?" It was still raining. At nine o'clock we were told that the attack was put off; we were to hold ourselves in readiness to attack at dawn.

No order came at dawn. And no more attacks were promised us after this. From the morning of September 24th to the night of October 3rd I had in all eight hours of sleep. I kept myself awake and alive by drinking about a bottle of whisky a day. I had never drunk it before and have seldom drunk it since; it certainly was good then. We had no blankets, ~~or~~ great-coats, ~~many of us had lost our~~^{or} waterproof sheets. We had no time or material to build new shelters, and the rain continued. Every night we went out to get in the dead of the other battalions. The Germans continued to be indulgent and we had few casualties. After the first day or two the bodies swelled and stank. I vomited more than once while ~~at~~ supervising the carrying. The ones that we could not get in from the German ^{wire} ~~wire~~ continued to swell until the wall of the stomach collapsed, either naturally or punctured by a bullet: a disgusting smell would float across. The colour of the dead faces ~~would~~ ^{would} changed from white to ^{yellow-} grey, to red, to purple, to green, to black, to slimy.

On the morning of the ^{27th} ~~twenty-seventh~~ a cry was heard from No Man's Land. It was a wounded man of the Middlesex who had recovered consciousness after two days. He was close to the German wire. Our men heard it and looked at each other. We had a lance-corporal called Baxter and he was tender-hearted. He was the man to boil up a special dixie of tea for the sentries of his section when they came off duty. When he heard the wounded man cry out he ran up and down the trench calling for a volunteer to come out with him and bring ^{the man} ~~him~~ in. Of course no one would go; it was death to put one's head over the trench. He came running to ask me. I excused myself as the only officer in the company. I said I ^{would} ~~could~~ come out with him at dusk, but I would not go now. So he went out himself. He jumped quickly over the parapet then strolled across waving a handkerchief; the Germans fired at him to frighten him, but he came on, so they let him come up close. They must have heard the Middlesex man themselves. Baxter continued towards them and when he got up to the Middlesex man he stopped and pointed to show the Germans what he was at. Then he dressed the man's wounds, gave him a drink of rum and some biscuit that he had with him and told him that he would come back again for him in the evening. He came back for him, with a stretcher party, and the man eventually recovered. I recommended ^{Baxter} ~~him~~ for the Victoria Cross, ^{being} ~~was~~ the only officer who had seen the thing done; but he only got a Distinguished Conduct Medal.

The Actor and I had decided to get into touch with the battalion on our right. It was the Tenth Highland Light Infantry. ^{one of the days First Hundred thousand battalions} I ~~went~~ ^{went} down their trench some time in the morning of the 26th. I walked nearly a quarter of a mile before seeing either a sentry or an officer. There were dead men, sleeping men, wounded men, gassed men, all lying anyhow. ^{The trench had been used as a latrine} Finally I met a Royal Engineer officer. He said to me, "If the Bosch knew what an easy job it was, he'd just walk over and take this trench." So I came back and told The Actor that we might expect to have our flank in the air at any moment. We turned the communication trench that made the boundary between the two battalions into a fire-trench facing right; a machine gun was mounted to put up a barrage in case they ran. On the night of the ^{27th} ~~twenty-seventh~~ the ^{Highlanders} ~~battalion~~ mistook some of our men, who were out in No Man's Land getting in the dead, for the enemy. They began firing wildly. The Germans retaliated. Our men caught the infection but were at once told to cease fire. "Cease fire" went along the trench until it came to the H.L.I., ^{who} ~~misheard~~ ^{it} as "Retire". A panic seized them and they came rushing back. Fortunately they came down the trench instead of over the top. They were stopped by a sergeant of the ^{Fif} ~~Fourth~~ Scottish Rifles, a territorial battalion now in support to ourselves and the Middlesex. He chased them back into their trench at the point of the bayonet.

On the 3rd of October we were relieved. The relieving troops were a composite battalion consisting of about a hundred men of the Queen's Regiment and about seventy Royal Welch Fusiliers, all that was left of our own ~~First~~ ^{First} Battalion. (Hammer Jones and Frank Jones-Bateman had both been wounded. Frank had his thigh broken with a rifle bullet while stripping the equipment off a wounded man in No Man's Land; the ^{cartridges} ~~cartridges~~ ^{had been set on fire by a shot and were exploding.*} in the man's pouches ~~...~~.) We went back to Saily La Bourse for a couple of days, where the colonel rejoined us, and then ^{farther} back to Annezin, a little village near Béthune where I lodged in a two-roomed cottage with an old woman called Adelphine Heu.

* He was recommended for a Victoria Cross but got nothing because no officer-evidence was available, which is a condition (of award)

CHAPTER XV.

At Annezin we reorganised. Some of the lightly wounded rejoined for duty and a big draft from the reserve ^{Third} Battalion arrived, so that in a week's time we were nearly seven hundred strong with a full complement of officers. Old Adelphine made me comfortable. She used to come in ^{in my room} and ~~talk~~ in the morning when I was shaving and tell me the local gossip, how stingy her daughter-in-law was, and what a rogue the Maire was, and about the woman at Fouqu^{ere} who had just been delivered of black twins. She said that the Kaiser was a bitch and spat on the floor to confirm it. Her favourite subject was the shamelessness of modern girls. Yet she herself had been gay and beautiful and much sought after when she was young, she said. She had been in service as lady's maid to a rich draper's wife of Béthune and had travelled widely with her in the surrounding country and even over the border into Belgium. She asked me about the various villages in which I had recently been billeted and told me scandal about the ^{important} big families who used to live in each. She asked me if I had been in La Bassée; she did not realise that it was in the hands of the enemy. I said no, but I had tried to visit it recently and had been detained. "Do you know Auchy, then?" I said that I had seen it often from a distance. "Then perhaps you know a big farm-house between Auchy and Cambrin called Les Briques Farm?" I said, startled, that I knew it very well and that it was a strong place with a moat and cellars and a kitchen garden now full of barbed-wire. She said, "Then I shall tell you. I was staying there in 1870, it was the year of the other war and there was at the house a handsome young petit corporal who was fond of me. So because he was a nice boy and because it was the war, we slept together and I had a baby. But God punished me and the baby died. That's a long time ago."

She told me that all the girls in Annezin prayed every night for the war to end and for the English to go away as soon as their money was spent. She said that the clause about the money was always repeated in case God should miss it.

Troops serving in the Pas de Calais loathed the French; except for occasional members of the official class ~~that~~ we ~~met they were~~ ^{found them} thoroughly unlikeable people and it was difficult to sympathise with their misfortunes. They had all the shortcomings of a border people. I wrote home about this time —

"I find it very difficult to love the French. Even when we have been billeted in villages where no troops have been before I have not met a single case of the hospitality that one meets among the peasants of other countries. It is worse than inhospitality here, for after all, we are fighting for their dirty little lives. They suck enormous quantities of money out of us too. Calculate how much has flowed into the villages around Béthune which for many months now have been continuously housing about a hundred thousand men. Apart from the money that they get paid directly as billeting allowance, there is the pay that the troops spend. Every private soldier gets his five-franc note (about four shillings) every ten days and spends it on eggs, coffee, and beer in the local estaminets; the prices are ridiculous and the stuff bad. In the brewery at Béthune, the other day, I saw barrels of already thin beer being watered from the canal with a big hose-pipe. The estaminet-keepers water it still further."

(The fortunes made in the war were consolidated after the Versailles Treaty when everyone in the devastated areas staked preposterous compensation claims for the loss of possessions that they had never had.) It was surprising that there were as few clashes between the British and French as there were. The Pas de Calais French hated us ~~except for our money~~ and were convinced that when the war was over we intended to stay and hold the Channel Ports. It was impossible for us at the time to realise that it was all the same to the peasants whether they were on the German or the British side of the line, except that the British had more money; and that they were not at all interested in the sacrifices that we were making for "their dirty little lives." It was impossible too for us not to be disgusted at French national greed; when we were told, for instance, that every British hospital train, the locomotive and carriages of which had been imported from England, had to pay a £200 fee for use of the rails on each journey they made from railhead to base. ~~It was a~~ ^{great} ~~French~~ ~~obsession~~ ~~with~~ ~~some~~ ~~people.~~ ~~It~~ ~~was~~ ~~for~~ ~~Edward~~ ~~Dalrymple~~ ~~who~~ ~~was~~ ~~fighting~~ ~~with~~ ~~great~~ ~~energy~~ ~~after~~ ~~the~~ ~~war~~ ~~was~~ ~~over,~~ ~~saying~~ ~~to~~ ~~me,~~ ~~"I~~ ~~shall~~ ~~never~~ ~~fight~~ ~~in~~ ~~another~~ ~~war,~~ ~~unless~~ ~~it~~ ~~is~~ ~~against~~ ~~the~~ ~~French.~~ ~~But~~ ~~I'd~~ ~~go~~ ~~for~~ ~~them~~ ~~if~~ ~~they~~ ~~are~~ ~~serious."~~ ~~This~~ ~~statement~~ ~~was~~ ~~significant~~ ~~and~~ ~~serious.~~

The fighting was still going on around Loos. We could hear the guns in the distance but it was clear that the thrust had failed and that we were now skirmishing for local advantages. But on the 13th of October there was a final flare-up; the noise of the guns was so great that even the inhabitants of Annezin, accustomed to these alarms, were properly frightened and began packing up in case the Germans broke through. Old Adelpine was in tears with fright. Early that afternoon I was in Béthune at the Globe drinking champagne-cocktails with some friends who had joined from the Third Battalion, when the assistant-provost-marshal put his head in the door and called out, "Any officers of the Fifth, Sixth, or Nineteenth Brigades here?" We jumped up. "You are to return at once to your units." "Oh God," said Robertson, "that means another show." Robertson had been in D. company and so escaped the ~~attack~~^{charge}. "We'll be pushed over the top to-night to reinforce someone and that'll be the end of us."

We hurried back to Annezin and found everything in confusion. "We're standing-to, at half an hour's notice for the trenches," we were told. We packed up hastily and in a few minutes the whole battalion was out in the road in fighting order. We were to go up to the Hohenzollern Redoubt, ^{and were issued} with new trench-maps of ~~the area~~^{it}. The men were in high spirits, even the survivors of ^{B. & C. companies} ~~the attack~~. They were singing songs to the accompaniment of an accordion and a penny whistle. Only at one time, when a 'mad-minute' of artillery noise was reached, they stopped and looked at each other and Sergeant Townsend said sententiously, "That's the charge. Many good fellows going west at this moment; maybe chums of ours." Gradually the noise died down, and a message came at last from Brigade that we would not be needed. It had been another dud show, chiefly to be remembered for the death of Charles Sorley,^a Captain in the Suffolks, one of the three poets of importance killed in the war. The other two were Isaac Rosenberg and Wilfred Owen.

This ended the operations for 1915. Tension was relaxed. We returned to battalion mess, to company drill and to riding-school for the young officers. ~~Everything~~^{It} was as though there had been no battle, except that the senior officers were fewer and the special-reserve element larger. Two or three days later we were back in trenches in the same sector. In October

I was gazetted a captain in the Third (Special Reserve) Battalion. Promotion in the Third Battalion was rapid for subalterns who had joined early, because the battalion had trebled its strength and so was entitled to three times as many captains as before. It was good to have my pay go up several shillings a day with an increase of war bonus and possible pension if I were wounded, but I did not consider that side of it much. It was rank that was effective overseas. ^{And} ~~then~~ here I was promoted captain over the heads of officers who had longer trench service and were older and better trained than myself. I went to the adjutant~~x~~ and offered not to wear the badges of rank while serving with the battalion. He ~~was~~ ^{(not unkindly,} said, "No, put your stars up. It can't be helped." ~~When I went to the adjutant,~~ ~~really,~~ I knew that he and the Colonel had no use for special-reserve captains unless they were outstandingly good, and would not hesitate to get rid of them. A special-reserve major and captain had been recently sent home from the First Battalion, with a confidential report of inefficiency. I was anxious to avoid ^{any such} ~~the~~ disgrace ^{Nor was my} ~~that happened to me.~~ ~~I was~~ ^{anxiety unfeignedly} ~~shortly~~ shortly after I left the Second Battalion two other special-reserve captains, one of whom had been promoted at the same time as myself, were sent back as "likely to be of more service in the training of troops at home". One of them was, I know, more efficient than I was.

I was in such a depressed ~~state~~ ^{of nervous} state, ^{now} that if I had gone into the trenches as ^a ~~an ordinary~~ company-officer I should have probably modified my formula for taking risks. Fortunately I had a ~~rest~~ rest from the front line, being attached to the brigade sappers ~~company~~. Hill of the Middlesex was also having this relief. He told me that the Middlesex ^{Colonel} had made a speech to the survivors of the battalion as soon as they were back in billets, telling them that the battalion had been unfortunate but would soon be given ^{an} a further opportunity of avenging its dead and making a fresh and, this time he hoped, successful attack upon La Bassée. "I know you Die-hards! You will go like lions over the top." Hill's servant had whispered confidentially to Hill "Not on purpose I don't, sir!" The sapping-company specialised in maintaining communication and reserve trenches in good repair. I was with it for a month before being returned to ordinary company duty. ^{My recall} ~~was~~ was a punishment for ^{failing} ~~having failed~~ to observe a paragraph in battalion orders one day when we were in billets, requiring my presence, ~~that the Royal Welch Fusiliers attached to this sapping company, on battalion parade.~~

My remaining trench service ^{with} ~~in~~ the Second Battalion this autumn was uneventful. There was no excitement left in patrolling, no horror in the continual experience of death. The single recordable incident I recall was one of purely technical interest, a new method that an officer named Owen and myself invented for dealing with machine-guns firing at night. The method was to give each sentry a piece of string about a yard long, with a cartridge tied at each end; when the machine-gun started firing, sentries who were furthest from the fire would stretch the string in the direction of the machine-gun and peg it down with the points of the cartridges. This gave a pretty accurate line on the machine-gun. When we had about thirty or more of these lines ^{taken} ~~on~~ on a single machine-gun we fixed rifles as accurately as possible along ^{them} ~~the~~ lines and waited for ^{it} ~~the~~ machine-gun; as soon as it started we opened five rounds rapid. This gave a close concentration of fire ^{and} no element of nervousness could disturb the aim, the rifles being secured between sand bags. Divisional headquarters asked us for a report of the method.

There was ^{a daily} ~~an~~ exchange of courtesies between our machine-guns and the Germans' ~~at~~ at stand-to; by removing cartridges from the ammunition belt ~~in the night~~ it was possible to rap out the rhythm of the bitch-call, "Meet me down in Piccadilly," to which the Germans would reply, though in slower tempo, because our guns were faster than theirs, "Yes, without your drawers on."

It was late in this October that I was sent a press-cutting from John Bull. Horatio Bottomley, the editor, was protesting against the unequal treatment for criminal offences meted out to ~~commoners~~ ^{commoners} and aristocrats. ~~He said~~ ^{he said} A young man, convicted in the police-court of gross indecency) ~~but~~ ^{because} he was the grandson of an earl! ~~he~~ was merely bound over and put in the care of a physician ~~that judge~~. An offender not belonging to the influential classes would have been given three months without the option of a fine. The article described in some detail how Dick, a sixteen year old boy, had made "grossly indecent advances" to a corporal in a Canadian regiment stationed near "Charterhouse College" and how the corporal ~~very properly~~ had given him in charge of the police. This news was nearly the end of me. But I decided ~~that~~ ^{that} Dick ~~was~~ ^{had been driven out of his mind by the war.} ~~by the war.~~ ~~like~~ ~~me~~. There was madness in the family, I knew; he had once shown me a ~~scrawled~~ letter from his grandfather scrawled in circles all over the page. ^{It would be easy to think of him as dead.}

I had now been in the trenches for five months and was getting past my prime. For the first three weeks an officer was not much good in the trenches; he did not know his way about, had not learned the rules of health and safety, and was not yet accustomed to recognising degrees of danger. Between three weeks and four months he was ~~at his best~~ ^{at his best} unless he happened to have any particular bad shock or sequence of shocks. ~~Then~~ ^{Then} he began gradually to decline in usefulness. ~~As~~ ^{At} six months he was still more or less all right; but by nine or ten months he began to be a drag on the other members of the company. After a year or fifteen months he was often worse than useless. Officers had a less laborious but a more nervous time than the men. There were proportionately twice as many neurasthenic cases among officers ^{as} among men, though the average life of a man before getting killed or wounded was twice as long as an officer's. Officers between ^{the ages of} twenty-three and thirty-three ~~had~~ ^{had} a longer useful life than ~~men~~ ^{those older or younger}. I was ~~a good deal~~

too young. ~~Men~~ Men over forty, though they did not ^{suffer from} ~~the~~ want of sleep so much, ^{as those under twenty had less resistance to} ~~the~~ sudden alarms and shocks.

~~W.H.R. Rivers~~ W.H.R. Rivers told me later that the action of one of the ductless glands - I forget which - accounted for this decline in military usefulness. It pumped its chemical into the blood as a sedative ^{for tortured} ~~the~~ nerves; this process went on until the condition of the blood was permanently affected and a man went about his tasks in a stupid and doped way, ^{he} ~~he~~ ^{cheated into further endurance.} It has taken some ten years for my blood to run at all clean ^{until this summer} ~~until this summer~~ ^{when I was a state of} ~~when I was a state of~~ ^{at my back} ~~at my back~~ ^{had} ~~had~~ two years or more continuous trench service. In ^{many} ~~many~~ cases they became dipsomaniacs. I knew three or four officers who had worked up to the point of two bottles of whisky a day before they were lucky enough to get wounded or sent home in some other way. A two-bottle company commander of one of our line battalions ^{happens to be alive} ~~still living~~ who in three shows running got his company needlessly destroyed because he was no longer capable of taking clear decisions.

^{Aside} Apart from wounds, gas and the accident of war the life of the trench soldier was ^{for the most part not un} ~~very~~ healthy, ^{As} food was plentiful and hard work in the open air made up for the discomfort of wet feet and clothes and draughty billets. A continual need for alertness discouraged minor illnesses; a cold was thrown off in a few hours, a ^{of indigestion} ~~bilious~~ attack ^{was} hardly noticed. This was true, at least, in a good battalion, where the men were ^{honorable} ~~honorable~~ set on going home either with a ^{wound} or not at all. In ^{an inferior} ~~an inferior~~ battalion the men would prefer a wound to bronchitis, but would not mind the bronchitis. In a bad battalion they did not care "whether," in the trench phrase, "the cow calved or the bull broke its bloody neck." In a really good battalion, ~~like~~^{as} the Second Battalion ^{was} when I went to it first, the question of getting wounded and going home was not permitted to be raised. Such a battalion had a very small sick-list. In 1914-15 winter there were no more than five casualties from "trench feet" in the Second, ~~the~~ ~~fall~~ ~~the~~ ~~more~~ ~~than~~ ~~eight~~; the don't-care battalions lost very heavily indeed. "Trench feet" was almost entirely a matter of morale, in spite of the lecture-formula that N.C.O's. and officers used to repeat time after time to the men:- "Trench feet is caused by tight boots, tight puttees or any other clothing calculated to interfere with the circulation of blood in the legs." Trench feet was caused, rather, by going to sleep with wet boots, cold feet, and depression. Wet boots by themselves did not matter. If the man warmed his feet at a brazier or stamped them until they were warm and then went off to sleep with a sand-bag tied round them he took no harm. He might even fall asleep with cold, wet feet, and they might swell slightly ~~owing to~~^{owing to} tightness of boots or puttees; but trench feet only came if he did not mind getting trench feet or anything else because his battalion had lost the power of sticking things out. At Bouchavesnes on the Somme in the winter of 1916⁻¹⁷ a battalion of dismounted cavalry lost half its strength in two days from "trench feet"; our Second Battalion had just had three weeks in the same trenches with no cases at all.

Autumn was melancholy in the La Bassée sector; In the big poplar forests the leaves were French-yellow, and the dykes were overflowing and the ground ~~was~~^{utterly complete sodden.} Béthune was not the place ~~as~~ it had been; the Canadians billeted there drew two or three times as much pay as our own troops and had sent the prices up. But it was still more or less intact and one could still get cream buns and fish-dinners.

In November I had orders to join the First Battalion / which was reorganising after the Loos fighting. I was delighted. I found it in billets at Locon, behind Festubert, which was only a mile or two to the north of Cambrin. The difference between the two battalions continued markedly throughout the war, however many times each battalion got broken. The difference was that the Second Battalion at the outbreak of war had just finished its eighteen years overseas tour, while the First Battalion had not been out of England since the South African war. The first battalion was therefore less old-fashioned in its militarism, ~~and~~ ^{and} more human; ~~Livers~~ ^{Livers} were better; the men had dealings with white women and not with brown. It would have been impossible in the First Battalion to see what I once saw in the Second—a senior officer pursuing a private soldier down the street kicking his bottom because he had been slack in saluting. The First Battalion was as efficient and as ^{regimental} ~~but~~ on the whole more successful in its fighting and a much easier battalion to live in.

The battalion already had its new company-commanders and I went as second-captain to young Richardson of A. company. He was from Sandhurst, and his company was ^{one of} the best that I was ever with. They were largely Welshmen of 1915 enlistment. None of the officers in the company were more than twenty-two or twenty-three years old. A day or two after I arrived I went to visit C. company where a third-battalion officer whom I knew was commanding. The "C's" greeted me in a friendly way. As we were talking I noticed a book lying on the table. It was the first book (except my Keats and Blake) that I had seen since I came to France that was not either a military text-book or a ~~novel~~ ^{rubbish-} novel. It was the Essays of Lionel Johnson. ~~When I had a chance I stole a~~ When I had a chance I stole a look at the fly-leaf, and the name was Siegfried Sassoon. I looked round to see who could possibly be called Siegfried Sassoon and bring Lionel Johnson with him to the First Battalion. He was obvious. ~~on~~ I got into conversation with him and a few minutes later we were walking to B ethune, being off duty until that night, and talking about poetry. Siegfried had at the time published nothing except a few privately-printed pastoral pieces of eighteen-ninetyish flavour and a satire on Masfield which, about half way through, had forgotten to be a satire and was rather good Masfield. We went to the cake-shop and ate cream buns. At this time I was getting my first book of poems, ^{Over the Brayer,} ready for the press; I had one or two drafts in my pocket-book and showed them to Siegfried. He told me that they were too realistic and that war should not be written about in a realistic way. In return he showed me some of his own poems. One of them began:

Return to greet me, colours that were my joy,
Not in the woeful crimson of men slain.....

This was before Siegfried had been in the trenches. I told him in my old-soldier manner that he would soon change his mind.

That night the whole battalion went up to work at a new defence scheme at Festubert. Festubert was nightmare and had been so since the first fighting there in 1914, when the inmates of its lunatic asylum had been caught between ~~the~~ two fires and broken out and run all over the countryside. The British trench line went across a stretch of ground marked on the map as "Marsh, sometimes dry in the summer." It consisted of [^]islands[^] of high-command trench and was a murderous place for patrols. The battalion had been nearly wiped out here six months previously. We were set to build up a strong reserve line. It was freezing hard and we were unable to make any progress on the frozen ground. We came here night after night. We raised a couple of hundred yards of trench about two or three feet high, at the cost of several men wounded ~~by~~ ^{from} casual shots ~~that~~ ^{was} skimming the trench in front of us. Work was resumed by other troops when the thaw came and a thick seven-foot-high ramp built. We heard later that it ~~was~~ ^{gradually sank down into} the marsh and in the end was completely engulfed.

When I left the Second Battalion I ~~had~~ ^{was} permitted to take my servant, Private Fahy (known as "Tottie Fay", after the actress), with me. ~~He~~ ^{Tottie} was a reservist from Birmingham who had been called up when war broke out and had been with the Second Battalion ever since. ~~He~~ ^{he} was a silversmith By trade and had recently when on leave made ~~me~~ a ~~silver~~ cigarette case ~~and~~ ^{as a present} engraved with my name. He worked well and we liked each other. When he arrived at the First Battalion he met one Sergeant Dickens who had been his boozing chum in India seven or eight years back; so they celebrated it. The next morning I was surprised to find my buttons not polished and no hot water for shaving. I was annoyed; it made me late for breakfast. I could get no news of Tottie. On my way to rifle inspection at nine o'clock at the company billet I noticed something unusual at the corner of a farm-yard. ~~It was~~ ^{It was} Field-Punishment No. 1 ^{being} carried out. ~~It was~~ ^{my first sight of it.} Tottie was the victim. He had ^{been awarded} twenty-eight days for "drunkenness in the field." He was ^{standing} spread-eagled to the wheel of a company limber, tied by the ankles and wrists in the form of an X. He remained in this position—'Crucifixion', they called it—for several hours a day; I forget how many, but it was a good working-day. The sentence was to be carried out for as long as the battalion remained in billets and was to be continued after the next spell of trenches. I shall never forget the look that Tottie gave me. He was a quiet, respectful, devoted servant and he wanted to tell me that he was sorry for having let me down. His immediate reaction ~~was that he wanted~~ ^{was an attempt} to salute; I could see him try to ~~bring~~ ^{bring} his hand to his forehead and his heels together. But he could do nothing; ~~his~~ his eyes filled with tears. The battalion police-sergeant, a fierce-looking man, had just finished knotting him up when I arrived. I ~~was~~ ^{told} Tottie ~~was~~ ^{that} I was sorry to see him in trouble. That drunk, as it proved, did him good in the end. I had to find another servant ~~and~~ ^{and} Old Joe, the quartermaster, knowing that Tottie was the only trained officer's servant in the battalion, ~~took~~ ^{took} him from me when his sentence expired; he even induced the Colonel to remit a few days of it. ~~He~~ ^{Tottie} was safer ^{in billets} with Old Joe than in ~~the~~ trenches with me. Some time in the summer of the following year his seven years contract as a reservist expired. When their "bakshee seven" expired, reservists were sent home for a few days and then "deemed to have re-enlisted under the Military Service Act" and recalled to the battalion. But Tottie made good use of his leave. His brother-in-law was director of a munitions factory and took Tottie in as a skilled metal worker. He was made a ~~starred man~~ ^{starred man} ~~and~~ ^{his} ~~work~~ work was so important to industry that he could not be spared for military service. So Tottie is, I hope, still alive. Good luck to him and to Birmingham. Sergeant Dickens was a different case. He was a fighter and one of the best N.C.O's. in either battalion of the regiment. He had been awarded the D.C.M. and Bar, the Military medal, and the French Médaille Militaire. Two or three times already he had been promoted to sergeant's rank and each time been reduced for drunkenness. He escaped field-punishment because it was ^{considered} sufficient ^{punishment} for him to lose his stripes; ~~and~~ whenever there was a battle Dickens ^{would} used to distinguish himself so conspicuously as a leader that he ^{would be} given his stripes back again.

Early in December the rumour came that we were going ~~back~~ for divisional training ^{to} the back areas. I would not believe ^{it} ~~this story~~, having heard ^{stories like} ~~this~~ ^{of this kind} too often, and was surprised when it turned out to be true. ^{Siegfried Sasson} ~~Sasson~~ in his Memoirs of a Fox-Hunting Man has described the battalion move. It was ^{an even} ~~an~~ more laborious experience for our A. company ~~than~~ than for his C. company. We got up at five o'clock one morning, ~~we~~ breakfasted hastily, packed our kits and marched down to the railhead three miles away. ~~Here~~ we had the task of entraining all the battalion stores, transport and transport animals. This took us to the middle of the morning. ~~We~~ ^{we} then entrained ourselves for a ten-hour journey to a junction on the Somme ^{about} ~~about~~ twenty miles away from the front line. The officers travelled in third-class apartments, the men in closed trucks marked "Hommes 40, chevaux 8" ^{and} they were very stiff when they arrived. ~~A.~~ ^{A.} Company was called on to do the detraining job, too. ~~When~~ when we had finished, the dixies of tea prepared for us were all cold. The other companies had been resting for a couple of hours; we ~~only~~ had a few minutes. The march ^{it} started about midnight and finished about six o'clock next morning, the men carrying their packs and rifles ^{was} along pavé roads and the rough chalk tracks of the Picardy downland. ^{There} was a competition between the companies as to which would have the fewest men falling out; ~~A.~~ ^{A.} won. The village we finally arrived at was called Montagne le Fayel.

No troops had been ^{hitherto} here before [redacted] and its inhabitants were annoyed at being knocked up in the middle of the night by our advance-guard to provide ^{accommodation} [redacted] for eight hundred men at two hours' notice. We found these Picard peasants much more likeable than the Pas de Calais people. I was billeted with an old man called Monsieur Elie Caron, a retired schoolmaster with a bright eye and white hair. He lived entirely on vegetables and gave me a vegetarian pamphlet entitled Comment Vivre Cent Ans. He already knew of the coming Somme Offensive, so this ^{was a good joke.} [redacted]. He also gave me ^{(Longfellow's) Evangeline} [redacted] in English. I ^{have} ^{been} always ^{sorry} [redacted] sorry for English books ^{that have} [redacted] stranded in France, whatever their demerits; ^{so} I accepted ^{it} [redacted] and later brought it home.

We were at Montagne for six weeks. The colonel, who appears in Siegfried's book as "Colonel Winchell", was known in the regiment as "Scatter", short for "Scatter-cash", because when he first joined the regiment he had been so lavish with his allowance. Scatter put the battalion through its paces with peace-time severity. He asked us to forget the trenches and to fit ourselves for the open warfare that was bound to come once the Somme defences were pierced. Every other day was a field day; we were back again in spirit to General Haking's Company Training. Even those of us who did not believe in the break-through thoroughly enjoyed these field-days. The guns could only just be heard in the distance, ~~and~~ it was quite unspoilt country, and every man in the battalion was fit. Days that were not field-days were given up to battalion drill and musketry. This training seemed entirely unrelated to war as we had experienced it. We played a lot of games, including inter-battalion rugger; I played full-back for the battalion. Three other officers were in the team: Richardson as front-row scrum-man, Pritchard, another Sandhurst boy who was fly-half, and David Thomas, a ~~Third~~^BBattalion second-lieutenant who was an inside three-quarter. David Thomas and Siegfried were the closest friends I made while in France. David was a simple, gentle ^{fellow and fond of reading.} Siegfried, he and I were together a lot.

One day David met me in the village street. He said, "Did you hear the bugle? There's a hell of a row on about something. All officers and warrant-officers are to meet in the village school-room at once. Scatter's looking as black as thunder. No one knows yet what the "axe" is about." We went along together~~x~~ and squeezed into one of the school desk-benches. When the colonel entered and the room was called to attention by the senior major, David and I hurt ourselves to stand^{ing} up bench and all. Scatter told us all to be seated. The officers were in one class, the warrant officers and non-commissioned officers in another. The colonel glared at us from the teacher's desk. He began his lecture with general accusations. ^{He saw} many signs of slovenliness that he had ^{lately} noticed in the battalion men with their pocket-flaps undone~~x~~ and actually walking down the village street with their hands in their trousers-pockets boots unpolished sentries strolling about on their beats at company billets instead of marching up and down in a soldier-like way rowdiness in the estaminets slackness in saluting~~x~~ with many other grave indications of lowered discipline. He threatened to stop all leave to the United Kingdom unless discipline improved. He promised us a saluting parade every morning before breakfast which he would attend in person. All this was general "axe-ing"^{tz} and we knew that he had not yet reached the particular axe. It was this:-

"I have here principally to tell you of a very disagreeable occurrence. As I was going out of my orderly-room early this morning I came upon a group of soldiers; I will not mention their company. One of these soldiers was in conversation with a lance-corporal. You may not believe it, but it was a fact that he addressed the corporal by his Christian name, he called him Jack. The ^corporal made no protest. To think that the First Battalion has sunk to a ~~state~~ ^{level where} it is possible for such familiarity to exist between N.C.O's and the men under their command! Naturally, I put the corporal under arrest and he appeared before me at once on the charge of "conduct unbecoming to an N.C.O." He was reduced to the ranks, and the man was given field punishment for using insubordinate language to an N.C.O. And, I warn you, if any further case of the sort comes to my notice—and I expect you officers to report the slightest instance ~~of this~~ to me at once instead of dealing with it as a company matter - ..."

I tried to catch Siegfried's eye, but he was busy avoiding it, so I caught David's instead. This is one of the caricature scenes that ~~now seem to sum up the various~~ stages of my life.

~~There was a fresco around the walls of the class-room illustrating the "Evils of Alcoholism". It started with the innocent boy being offered a drink by his mate, and then his downward path culminating in wife-beating, murder and delirium tremens.~~

The battalion's only complaint against Montagne was that women were not ~~so~~ easy to get hold of in that part of the country as around Béthune. The officers had the unfair advantage of being able to borrow ~~horses~~ and ride into Amiens. ~~I never made the journey myself, though the news about Dick had so shaken me that I once or twice contemplated it in sheer wretchedness.~~

There was a Blue Lamp at Amiens as there was at Abbeville, Havre, Rouen and all the big towns behind the lines. The Blue Lamp was for officers, as the Red Lamp was for men. It was most important for discipline to be maintained in this way.

R In January the

Seventh Division sent two company officers from each brigade to instruct troops at the Base. I and a captain in the Queen's were the two who had been out longest, so we were chosen; it was a gift of two months' longer life to us.

The next news I heard was from Siegfried who wrote from the Exchange Hotel Liverpool that no doubt I was worrying about him. He had come up to Liverpool a day or two before and walked into the Third Battalion Orderly Room at Litherland feeling like nothing on earth but probably looking fairly self-possessed. The senior-major was commanding, the colonel being away on holiday. I was much relieved at this bit of luck and to hear from Siegfried that the senior-major was nicer than anything I could imagine and had made him feel an utter brute. The senior-major had consulted the general commanding Mersey defences and the general was consulting God or someone like that. Meanwhile he was staying at the Hotel, having sworn not to run away to the Caucasus. He hoped in time to persuade them to be nasty about it and said that he didn't think that they realised that his performance would soon be given great publicity. He hated the whole thing more than ever and knew more than ever that he was right and would never repent of what he had done. He said that things were looking better in Germany but that Lloyd George would probably say that it was a "plot". The politicians seemed to him incapable of behaving like human beings.

Wednesdays were guest-nights when the married officers who usually dined at home were expected to attend. The Band played Gilbert and Sullivan music behind a curtain. In the intervals the regimental harper gave solos - Welsh melodies picked out rather uncertainly on a hand-harp. When the programme was over the Bandmaster was invited to the senior officers' table for his complimentary glass of light-or-vintage. When he was gone and the junior officers had retired the port went round and round and the conversation, at first very formal, became rambling and intimate. Once I remember, a senior-major laid it down axiomatically that every so-called sportsman had at one time or another committed a sin against sportsmanship. When challenged he cross-examined each of his neighbours in turn, putting them on their honour to tell the truth. One of them, blushing, admitted that he had once shot grouse two days before the Twelfth - "it was my last chance before I rejoined the battalion in India." Another said that when a public-schoolboy and old enough to know better he had killed a sitting pheasant with a stone. The next one had gone out with a poacher - in his Sandhurst days - and crumbled poison-berry into a trout-stream. An even more scandalous admission came from a new-army major, a gentleman-farmer, that his estate had been overrun with foxes one year and, the headquarters of the nearest hunt being thirty miles away, he had given his bailiff permission to protect the hen-roosts with a gun. Finally it was the turn of the ~~battalion~~ medical officer to be cross-examined. He said, "Well, once when I was a student at St. Andrews a friend asked me to put ten bob for him on a horse in the Lincolnshire. I couldn't find my bookmaker in time. The horse lost and I never returned the ten bob." At this one of the guests, an officer in the King's Own Scottish Borderers, became suddenly excited, jumped up and leant over the table, doubling his fists. "And was not the name of the horse Strathspey? And will you not pay me my ten shillings now immediately?"

Chapter 216 I was one of about thirty instructors at the Havre "bullring" where newly arrived drafts were sent for technical instruction before going up the line. Most of my colleagues were specialists in musketry, machine-gun, gas, or bombs. I had no specialist training, only general experience. I was put on instructional work in trench relief and trench discipline in a model set of trenches. My principal other business was arms-drill. One day it rained, and the commandant of the "Bull Ring" suddenly ordered me to lecture in the big concert hall. "There are three thousand men there waiting for you, and you're the only available officer with a loud enough voice to make himself heard." They were Canadians, ~~three thousand~~ ~~men~~, so instead of giving my usual semi-facetious lecture on "How to be happy though in the trenches" I paid them the compliment of telling them the story of Loos and what a balls-up it was and why it was a balls-up. It was the only audience that I ^{have} ever held for an hour with real attention. I expected the commandant to be furious with me, because the principal object of the Bull Ring was to inculcate the offensive spirit, but he took it well and I had several more concert-hall lectures put on me after this. ^{From par} In the instructors' mess the chief subjects of conversation besides local and technical talk were morale, the reliability of various divisions in battle, the value of different training methods, and war-morality with particular reference to atrocities.

We talked more freely there than would have been possible either in the line or in the messes.

^{no para} We decided that about a third of the troops in the British Expeditionary Force were dependable on all occasions: ^{these were} ~~the divisions that~~ were always called on for the most important tasks. About a third were variable, that is, ^{where} a ~~division~~ ^{division} contained one or two bad battalions, but ~~the~~ could more or less trusted; the remainder were ^{more or less} untrustworthy; ~~and~~ being put in positions of comparative safety, ^{they} had about a quarter of the casualties that the best divisions had. It was a matter of pride to belong to one of the recognised best divisions - the 7th, the 29th, Guards, First Canadian, for instance. They were not pampered when in reserve as the German storm-troops were, but promotion, leave, and the chance of a wound came quicker in them. ~~They~~ ^{The men agreed that} the most dependable British troops were the midland county Regiments, industrial Yorkshire and Lancashire troops and the Londoners; ~~the~~ Ulstermen, Lowland Scots and Northern English were pretty good. The Catholic Irish and the Highland Scots were not considered so good; ~~they~~ ^{they} took unnecessary risks in trenches and had unnecessary casualties, and in battle, though they usually made their objective, they too often lost it in the counter-attack; without officers they were no good. English southern county regiments varied from good to very bad. All Colonial troops were good.

We once discussed ~~the~~ which were the cleanest troops in trenches, taken in nationalities. We agreed on a list like this, in descending order:- English ^{and} German ^{Protestants;}
~~the~~ ^{Wish & Canadians} Northern Irish; ~~the~~ ^{Scottish;}
~~the~~ Irish and German Catholics; Mahomedan Indians; Algerians; Portuguese; Belgians; French. The Belgians and French were put there for spite; they were not appreciably dirtier than the Algerians or Portuguese, ~~the~~ Atrocities. Propaganda reports of atrocities were, we agreed, ridiculous. Atrocities against civilians were surely few; ~~we~~ remembered that while the Germans were in a position to commit atrocities against enemy civilians, Germany in 9

 in
 1.

itself, except for the early Russian cavalry raid, had never had the enemy on her soil. We no longer believed accounts of unjustified German atrocities in Belgium; knowing the Belgians now at first-hand. By atrocities we meant specifically rape, mutilation and torture, not summary shootings of suspected spies, harbourers of spies, franc-tirurs or disobedient local officials. If the atrocity list was to include the accidental-on-purpose bombing or machine-gunning of civilians from the air, the Allies were now ~~committing~~ ^{commit} as many atrocities as the Germans. French and Belgian civilians had often tried to win our sympathy and presents by exhibiting mutilations of children - ~~to~~ ^{stumps of hands and feet,} for instance - representing them as deliberate fiendish atrocities when they were merely the result of shell-fire, British or French shell-fire as likely as not. We did not believe that rape was any more common on the German side of the line than on the Allied side. The women ~~on the German side~~ ^{that} were no doubt complaisant or mercenary enough to make rape as unnecessary as it was on this ~~side~~. ^{of course a} Bully-beef diet, fear of death, and absence of wives ^{of women} made ample provision ^{in the occupied areas} necessary ~~for the German Army~~ ^{provided hospitals} the German Army authorities in the principal ^{French} towns behind the line, ~~as did the German~~ ^{as did the French} on the Allied side.

As for atrocities against soldiers. The difficulty was to say where to draw the line. For instance, the British soldier at first regarded as atrocious the use of bowie-knives by German patrols. After a time he learned to use them himself; they were cleaner-killing weapons than revolvers or bombs. The Germans regarded as atrocious the British Mark VII rifle bullet which was more apt to turn on striking than the German bullet. For true atrocities, that is, personal ~~rather than~~ ^{military violation of} the code of war, there were few opportunities. The most obvious opportunity was in the interval between surrender of prisoners and their arrival (or non-arrival) at headquarters. And it was an opportunity of which advantage was only too often taken. Nearly every instructor in the Mess knew of specific cases when prisoners had been murdered on the way back. The commonest motives were, it seems, revenge for the death of friends or relations, jealousy of the prisoner's pleasant trip back to a comfortable prison camp in England, military enthusiasm, fear of being suddenly overpowered by the prisoners, or, ~~usually~~ ^{more} simply, not wanting to be bothered with the escorting job. In any of these cases the conductors would report on arrival at headquarters that a German shell had ~~been~~ ^{killed} the prisoners; no questions would be asked. We had every reason to believe that the same thing happened on the German side where prisoners, as useless mouths to feed in a country already on short rations, were even less welcome. We had none of us heard of prisoners being more than threatened ^{at headquarters} to get military information from them; the sort of information that trench-prisoners could give was not of sufficient importance to make torture worth while; in any case it was found that when treated kindly prisoners were anxious in gratitude to tell as much as they knew.

The troops that had the worst reputation for acts of violence against prisoners were the Canadians (and later the Australians). With the Canadians the motive was said to be revenge for a Canadian found crucified with bayonets through his hands and feet in a German trench; this atrocity was never substantiated nor did we believe the story freely circulated that the Canadians crucified a German officer in revenge shortly afterwards. (Of the Australians the only thing to be said was that they were ~~Australians~~ and only two generations removed from the days of Ralph Rashleigh and Marcus Ward.)

How far this reputation for atrocities was deserved and how far it was due to the overseas habit of bragging, we could not decide. We only knew that to have committed atrocities against prisoners was, among the overseas men and even among some British troops, a boast ~~of prowess~~ not a confession.

I heard two first-hand accounts later in the war:

A Canadian-Scot:- "I was sent back with three bloody prisoners, you see, and one was limping and groaning, so I had to keep on kicking the sod down the trench. He was an officer. It was getting dark and I was getting fed up, so I thought, 'I'll have a bit of a game.' I had them covered with the officer's revolver and I made 'em open their pockets. Then I dropped a Mills bomb in each, with the pin out, and ducked behind a traverse. Bang, Bang, Bang! No more bloody prisoners. No good Fritzes but dead 'uns."

An Australian:- "Well, the biggest lark I had was at Morlancourt when we took it the first time. There were a lot of Jerries in a cellar and I said to 'em 'Come out you Camarades.' So out they came, a dozen of 'em, with their hands up. 'Turn out your pockets,' I told 'em. They turned 'em out. Watches and gold and stuff, all dinkum. Then I said 'Now back into your cellar, you sons of bitches.' For I couldn't be bothered with 'em. When they were all down I threw half a dozen Mills bombs in after 'em. I'd got the stuff all right, and we weren't taking prisoners that day."

The only first-hand account I heard of large-scale atrocities was from an old woman at Cardonette on the Somme with whom I was billeted in July 1916. It was at Cardonette that a battalion of French Turcos overtook the rear guard of a German division retreating from the Meuse in September, 1914. The Turcos surprised the dead-weary Germans while they were still marching in column. The old woman went with gestures through a pantomime of slaughter ending "Et enfin, ces animaux leur ont arraché les oreilles et les ont mis à la poche."

The presence of coloured troops in Europe was from the German point of view ^(we know) one of the chief Allied atrocities. We sympathised.

Recently at Flixécourt, one of the instructors told us, the cook of a corps headquarter mess used to be visited at the château every morning by a Turco: he was orderly to a French liaison officer. The Turco used to say "~~Tommy~~ ^{Tommy, give} Johnny pozzy" and a tin of plum and apple jam used to be given him. One afternoon the corps was due to shift, so that morning the cook said to the Turco, giving him his farewell tin, "Oh la, la, Johnny, napeo pozzy to-morrow." The Turco would not believe it. "Yes," ^{Tommy, mate} he said, "Pozzy for Johnny to-morrow, to-morrow, to-morrow." To get rid of him the cook said "Fetch me the head of a Fritz, Johnny, to-night. I'll ask the General to give you pozzy to-morrow to-morrow to-morrow." "All right, mate" said the Turco, "me get Fritz head tonight, General give me pozzy to-morrow." That evening the mess cook of the new corps that had taken over the château was surprised to find a Turco asking for him ^(and swinging) a bloody head in a sandbag. "Here's Fritz head, mate," said the Turco, "General give me pozzy to-morrow to-morrow to-morrow." As Flixécourt was twenty miles or more behind the line - - - - - He did not need to end the story, ^{and} ~~he~~ swore it was true because he had seen ~~the~~ head.

~~_____~~
We discussed the continuity of regimental morale. ~~_____~~

~~_____~~ A captain in a line-battalion of one of the Surrey Regiments ~~_____~~ said: "It all depends on the Reserve Battalion at home." He had had a year's service when the war broke out; the battalion, which had been good, had never recovered from the first battle of Ypres. He said: "What's wrong with us is that we have a rotten Depot. The drafts are bad and so we get a constant re-infection." He told me one night in our sleeping hut: "In both the last two attacks that we made I had to shoot a man of my company to get the rest out of the trench. It was so bloody awful that I couldn't stand it. It's the reason why I applied to be sent down here." This was not the usual loose talk that one heard at the Base, ~~he~~ was a good fellow and he was speaking the truth. I was sorrier for Phillips - that was not his name - than for any other man I met in France. He deserved a better regiment. There was never any trouble with the Royal Welch like that. The boast of every good battalion in France was that it had never lost a trench; both our battalions made it. This boast had to be understood broadly, it meant never having been forced out of a trench by an enemy attack without recapturing it before the action ended. Capturing a German trench and being unable to hold it for lack of reinforcements did not count, nor did retirement from a trench by order or when the battalion on the left or right had broken and left a ~~flank~~ flank in the air. And in the final stages of the war trenches could be honourably abandoned ~~as~~ as being entirely obliterated by bombardment, or because not really trenches at all but a line of selected shell craters.

We all agreed on the value of arms-drill as a factor in morale. "Arms-drill ^{done as it should be.} ~~is~~, ^{" someone "} said, is beautiful, especially when the company feels itself as a single being and each movement is not a movement of every man together, but a single movement of one large creature." I used to have big bunches of Canadians to drill four or five hundred at a time. Spokesmen came forward once and asked what ~~the~~ ^{the was in} sense ~~of~~ sloping and ordering arms and fixing and unfixing bayonets ~~was~~.

They said they had come to France to fight and not to guard Buckingham Palace. I ^{told them} ~~was~~ ~~at~~ ~~the~~ ~~time~~ ~~that~~ ~~they~~ ~~were~~ ~~there~~

~~that~~ ~~in~~ ~~the~~ ~~form~~ ~~in~~ ~~which~~ ~~I~~ ~~had~~ ~~served~~ ~~in~~ ~~every~~ ~~division~~ ~~that~~ ~~I~~ ~~was~~ ~~with~~ ~~there~~ ~~had~~ been three different kinds of troops. Those that ~~had~~ ^{had} guts, but ~~no~~ ^{were} good at drill; those that ~~were~~ ^{were} no good at drill and ~~had~~ ^{had} no guts either; and those that ~~had~~ ^{had} guts and ~~were~~ ^{were} good at drill. These last fellows ~~are~~ ^{were} always reckoned ~~to~~ ^{to} be the best men in a show. ~~I~~ ^{didn't} know why and I ~~didn't~~ ^{didn't} care. ~~I~~ ~~was~~ ~~at~~ ~~the~~ ~~time~~ ~~that~~ ~~they~~ ~~were~~ ~~there~~

~~that~~ ~~when~~ ~~they~~ ~~were~~ ~~there~~ ~~they~~ ~~were~~ ~~better~~ ~~at~~ ~~fighting~~ ~~than~~ ~~the~~ ~~Guards~~ ~~Division~~, ~~they~~ ~~could~~ ~~perhaps~~ ~~not~~ ~~afford~~ ~~to~~ ~~neglect~~ ~~their~~ ~~arms~~ ~~drill~~. ~~I~~ ~~was~~ ~~at~~ ~~the~~ ~~time~~ ~~that~~ ~~they~~ ~~were~~ ~~there~~

^{often} We ~~often~~ theorised in the Mess about arms-drill. We knew that the best arms-drill never came from being bawled at by a sergeant-major, that there must be perfect respect between the man who gives the order and the men that carry it through. The ~~best~~ ^{best} test of ~~drill~~ ^{drill} ~~was~~ ^{came} ~~when~~ ^I ~~the~~ ~~officer~~ ~~gave~~ ~~an~~ ~~incorrect~~ ~~word~~ ~~of~~ ~~command~~, ¹⁶ the company could carry through the order intended without hesitation, or, ^{suppose} the order happened to be impossible, could stand absolutely still or continue marching without any ~~serious~~ ^{disorder in the ranks, that was good drill} ~~moment~~. The corporate spirit that came from drilling together was regarded by some instructors as leading to loss of initiative in the men drilled. Others denied this and said it acted just the other way round. "Suppose there is a section of men with rifles and they are isolated from the rest of the company and have no N.C.O. in charge and meet a machine gun. Under the stress of danger that section will have that all-one-body feeling of drill and will obey an imaginary word of command."

There will be no communication between its members but there will be a drill movement. Two men will quite naturally open fire on the machine-gun while the remainder will work round, ^{part} on the left flank and ^{part} on the right, and the final rush will be simultaneous. Leadership ~~is~~ is supposed to be the perfection for which drill has been instituted. That is wrong. Leadership is only the first stage. Perfection of drill is communal action. Drill ^{may seem} ~~is~~ ^{to be antiquated} parade-ground stuff, but ^{it is the} ~~is~~ ^{foundation of tactics and} musketry. It was ^{parade-ground} musketry that won all the battles in our regimental histories, ~~is~~ this war ^{will be won by} ~~is~~ ^{parade-ground} tactics, ^{simple drill} the tactics of small units ~~is~~ ^{fighting} in limited spaces ^{in noise} and confusion so great that ~~is~~ leadership ~~is~~ ^{is} quite impossible." In spite of variance on this point we all agreed that regimental ^{pure} ~~is~~ was the greatest moral force that kept a battalion going as an effective fighting unit. Contrasting it particularly with patriotism and religion.

Patriotism. ~~is~~ ^{is} there was no patriotism ~~is~~ in the trenches. It was too ^{remote} ~~is~~ a sentiment, and rejected as only fit for civilians. ~~is~~ A new arrival who talked patriotism would soon be told to cut it out. ~~is~~ ^{As} "Blighty," ^{Great Britain was} a quiet easy place to get back to out of the present foreign misery, but as a nation it was nothing. The nation included not only the trench-soldiers themselves and those who had gone home wounded, but the staff, Army Service Corps, lines of communication-troops, base-units, home-service units, and ^{then civilians} ~~is~~ ^{down to the} detested grades of ~~is~~ ^{is} journalists, profiteers, 'starred' men exempted from enlistment, ^{conscientious objectors,} members of the government. [redacted]

[redacted]. The trench-soldier with this carefully graded caste-system of honour did not consider that the German trench-soldier might have exactly the same system himself. He thought of Germany as a nation in arms, a unified nation inspired with the sort of patriotism that he despised himself. He believed most newspaper reports of conditions and sentiments in Germany though believing little or nothing of what he read about conditions and sentiments in England. ^{His cynicism, in fact, was not confined to his own country. But he} [redacted] never underrated the German as a soldier. Newspaper libels on Fritz's courage and efficiency were resented by all trench-soldiers of experience.

Religion. It was ^{saw} [redacted] that ^{not} one soldier in a hundred was inspired by religious feeling of even the crudest kind.

It would have been difficult to ^{remain} religious in the trenches ^{though one had survived the} [redacted] ^{of the training battalion at home} irreligion. A regular sergeant at Montagne, a Second Battalion man, had recently told me that he did not hold with religion in time of war. He said that the niggers (meaning the Indians) were right in officially relaxing their ^{religious} rules when they were fighting.

*And all this damn nonsense, sir, excusing me, sir, that we read in the papers ^{150,} about how miraculous it is that the wayside crucifixes are always getting shot at but the figure of our Lord Jesus somehow don't get hurt, it fairly makes me sick, sir. This was to explain why in giving practice fire orders from the hill-top he had shouted out, "Seven hundred, half left, bloke on cross five rounds consecrate FIRE!" His platoon even the two men whose letters home always had the same formal beginning, "Dear Sister in Christ," or "Dear Brother in Christ" blazed away. [redacted].

^{comic} The troops, while ready to believe in the Kaiser as a ^{comic} [redacted] Personal Devil, were aware that the German soldier was on the whole more devout than himself in the worship of God. In the Instructors Mess we spoke freely of God and Gott as opposed tribal deities. For the regimental Chaplains as a body we had no respect. If the regimental Chaplains had shown one tenth the courage, endurance and other human qualities that the regimental doctors showed, we agreed, the British Expeditionary Force might well have started a religious revival. But they had not. The fact is that they were under orders not to get mixed up with the fighting, to stay behind with the transport and not to risk their lives. No soldier could have any respect for a chaplain who obeyed these orders, and yet there was not in our experience one chaplain in fifty who was not glad to obey them. Occasionally on a quiet day in a quiet sector the chaplain would make ^{a daring} [redacted] afternoon visit [redacted] to the support line and distribute a few cigarettes, but that was all. ^{But} ~~_____~~ he was ^{always} in evidence ~~_____~~ back in rest-billets. Sometimes the ^c Colonel would summon him to come up with the rations and bury the day's dead and he would arrive, speak his lines, and hastily retire. The position was made difficult by the respect that most of the commanding officers had for the cloth, but it was a respect that they soon outwore. (The ^c Colonel in one battalion I served with got rid of four new chaplains in as many months. Finally he applied for a Roman Catholic chaplain, alleging a change of faith in the ^{men under his command} ~~_____~~.) For, as I should have said before, the Roman Catholics were not only permitted in posts of danger but definitely enjoined to be wherever fighting was so that they could give extreme unction to the dying. And we had never heard of an R.C. chaplain who was unwilling to do all that was expected of him and more. ^{It was recalled that} ~~_____~~ Father Gleeson of the Munsters, ~~_____~~ when all the officers were put out of action at the first battle of Ypres, stripped off his black badges and ^{taking} ~~_____~~ command of the survivors ^{held the line!} ~~_____~~ ~~_____~~.

Anglican chaplains were remarkably out of touch with their troops. I told how the Second Battalion chaplain just before the Loos fighting had preached a violent sermon on the battle against sin, and how one old soldier behind me had ^{grumbled} ~~_____~~ "Christ, as if one bloody push wasn't enough to worry about at a time." The Catholic padre on the other hand had given his men his blessing and told them that if they died fighting for the good cause they would go straight to Heaven or at any rate would be excused a great many years in Purgatory. Someone told of the chaplain of his battalion when he was in Mesopotamia; ~~_____~~ ^{how} on the eve of a big battle ^{he had} ~~_____~~ ^{ed} preached a sermon on the commutation of tithes. This was ^{more sensible} ~~_____~~ than the ~~_____~~ battle against Ain, he said.

^{it} [redacted] was quite ^{up in the air} [redacted] and took the men's minds off ^{the fighting.} [redacted]

I was feeling a bit better after a few weeks at the Base though the knowledge that this was only temporary relief was with me all the time. One day I [redacted] walked out of the Mess to begin the afternoon's work on the drill ground. I had to pass by the place where bombing instruction was given.

[redacted] A group of men ^{was standing} around the table where the various types of bombs were set out for demonstration. There was a sudden crash. [redacted]

[redacted] An instructor of the Royal Irish Rifles had been giving a little unofficial instruction before the proper instructor arrived. He had picked up a No.1 percussion grenade and said "Now, lads, you've got to be careful with this chap. Remember that if you touch anything while you're swinging it, it will go off." To illustrate the point he rapped it against the edge of the table. It killed him and another man and more or less severely wounded ^{two} [redacted] others.

CHAPTER XVII.

I rejoined the First Battalion in March, finding it in the line again, on the Somme. It was [redacted], the primrose season. We went in and out of the Fricourt trenches, with billets at Morlancourt, a country village at that time untouched by shell-fire. (Later it was knocked to pieces; the Australians and the Germans captured and re-captured it from each other several times, until there was nothing left except the site.) "A" company headquarters were in a farmhouse kitchen. We slept in our valises on the red brick floor. The occupants were an old lady and her daughter. The old lady was senile and paralysed; about all she could do was shake her head and say "Triste, la guerre." We called her "Triste la Guerre". Her daughter used to carry her about in her arms. [redacted]

The Fricourt trenches were cut in chalk, which was better in wet weather than the La Bassée clay. We were unlucky in having a battalion frontage where the lines came closer to each other than at any other point for miles. It was only recently that the British line had been extended down to the Somme. [redacted] The French had been content, as they usually were unless they definitely intended a battle, to be at peace with the Germans and not dig in too near. But here there was a slight ridge and neither side could afford to let the other hold the crest, so they shared it, after a prolonged dispute. It was used by both the Germans and ourselves as an experimental station for new types of bombs and grenades. The trenches were wide and tumbledown, too shallow in many places and without sufficient traverses. The French had left relics of their slovenliness [redacted] corpses buried too near the and surface; ~~but~~ of their love of security ~~a~~ number of lousy but deep dug-outs. We busied ourselves raising the front line parapet and building traverses to limit the damage of the trench-mortar shells that were continually falling. Every night not only the companies in the front line but both support companies were hard at work all the time. It was even worse than Guinchey for rats; they used to run about ~~A~~ company mess while we were at meals. We used to eat with revolvers beside our plates and punctuate our conversation with sudden volleys at a rat rummaging at somebody's valise or crawling along the timber support of the roof above our heads. ~~A~~ company officers were gay. We had all been in our school choir except Edmund Dadd, who sang like a crow, and we used to chant church anthems and bits of cantatas, whenever things were going well. Edmund insisted on joining in.

We were at dinner one day when a Welsh boy came rushing in, hysterical, ~~with~~ with terror. He shouted out to Richardson, "Sirr, sirr, there is a trenss-mortar in my dug-out." This in sing-song Welsh made us all shout with laughter. Richardson said, "Cheer up, 33 Williams, how did a big thing like a trench-mortar happen to be in your dug-out?" But 33 Williams could not explain. He went on again and again, "Sirr, sirr, there is a trenss-mortar in my dug-out." Edmund Dadd went out to investigate. ~~He found~~ ^{He found} that a trench-mortar shell had fallen into the trench, bounced down the dug-out steps, exploded ~~x~~ and killed five men. 33 Williams had been lying asleep and had been protected by the body of another man; he was the only one unhit.

Our greatest trial was the canister. It was a two-gallon drum with a cylinder ~~inside~~ ^{inside} containing about two pounds of an explosive called Ammonal that looked like salmon paste, smelt like marzipan and when it went off sounded like the Day of Judgement. The hollow around the cylinder was filled with scrap metal apparently collected by the French villagers behind the German line - rusty nails, fragments of British and French shells, spent bullets and the screws, nuts and bolts that heavy lorries leave behind on the road. We dissected one canister that had not exploded and found in it, among other things, the cog-wheels of a clock and half a set of false teeth. The canister was easy to hear coming and looked harmless in the air, but its shock was as shattering as the very heaviest shell. It would blow in any but the deepest dug-outs, and the false teeth and cog-wheels and ^{so on would go} flying all over the place. We could not agree how a thing ^{of} that size was fired. The problem was not solved until July 1st, when the battalion attacked from these ^{same} trenches and found one of the canister-guns with its crew. It was a wooden cannon buried in the earth and fired with a time fuse. The crew offered to surrender; but our men had sworn for months to get the crew of that gun.

One evening I was in the trench with Richardson and David Thomas (near "Trafalgar Square," ^{should} any one ^{remember} that trench-junction) when we met Pritchard and the adjutant. We stopped to talk. Richardson complained what a devil of a place it was for trench-mortars. Pritchard said, "That is where I come in." He was the battalion trench-mortar officer and had just been given the first two Stokes' mortar-guns that we had seen in France. Pritchard said, "They're beauties. I've been trying them out and to-morrow I'm going to get some of my own back. I can put four or five shells in the air at the same time." The adjutant said, "About time, too. We've had three hundred casualties in the last month here. It doesn't seem so many as that because we've had no officer casualties. In fact we've had about five hundred casualties in the ranks since Loos, and not a single officer." Then he suddenly realised that he had said something unlucky. David said, "Touch wood." Everybody sprang to touch wood but it was a French trench and unrevetted. I pulled a pencil out of my pocket; that was wood enough for me. Richardson said, "I'm not superstitious, anyway."

The next evening I was leading up A. company for a working party. B. and D. companies were in the line and we overtook C. ^{which was} [redacted] also going up to work. David was bringing up the rear of C. He was looking strange, worried about something. I had never seen him anything but cheerful all the time I had known him. I asked what was the matter. He said, "Oh, I'm fed up and I've got a cold." C. company went along to the right of the battalion frontage and we went along to the left. It was a ^{weird} ~~a~~ ^{weird kind of} [redacted] night, with a bright moon. A German occupied sap was only forty or fifty yards away. ~~[redacted]~~ We were standing on the parapet piling up the sandbags, with the moon behind us, ^{but} the German sentries ignored us ^{probably} because they had work on hand themselves. It often happened when both sides were busy putting up proper defences that they turned a blind eye to each other's work. Sometimes, it was said, ~~[redacted]~~ the rival wiring parties ~~[redacted]~~ "as good as borrow^{ed} each other's mallets" for hammering in the pickets. The Germans were much more ready to live and let live than we were. (The only ^{time, so far as I know, ~~except~~ ^{besides} Christmas, 1914 that} ~~[redacted]~~ both sides show^{ed} themselves in daylight without firing at each other was once at Ypres when the trenches got so flooded that there was nothing for it but for both sides to crawl out on top to avoid drowning.) There was a continual exchange of grenades and trench-mortars on our right: the canister was going over and the men found it difficult to get out of its way in the dark. But for the first time we were giving the enemy as good as they gave us. Pritchard had been using his Stokes' mortar all day and had sent over two or three hundred rounds; twice they had located his emplacement and he had had to shift hurriedly.

A company worked from seven in the evening until midnight. We must have put thousands of sandbags into position and fifty yards of front trench were beginning to look presentable. About half-past ten there was rifle fire on the right and the sentries passed down the news "Officer hit." Richardson at once went along to see who it was. He came back to say, "It's young Thomas. He got a bullet through the neck, but I think he's all right; it can't have hit his spine or an artery because he's walking down to the dressing station." I was pleased at this news. I thought that David would be out of it long enough perhaps to escape the coming offensive and perhaps even the rest of the war. At twelve o'clock we had finished for the night. Richardson said to me, "Von Runicke, take the company down for their rum and tea, will you? They've certainly deserved it to-night. I'll be along in a few minutes. I'm going out with Corporal Chamberlen to see what work the wiring party's been doing all this time." So I took the men back. When we were well started I heard a couple of shells come over somewhere behind us. I noticed them because they were the only shells fired that night; five-nines they seemed by the noise. We were nearly back at Maple Redoubt, which was the name of the support line on the reverse side of the hill, when we heard the cry "Stretcher-bearers" and after a while a man came running to say, "Captain Graves is hit." There was a general laugh and we went on; but a stretcher party went up anyhow to see what was wrong. It was Richardson; the shells had caught him and the corporal among the wire. The corporal had his leg blown off and died of wounds a day or two later. Richardson [redacted] had been blown into a shell-hole full of water and had lain there ^{stunned} for some minutes before the sentries heard ^{the wiford's} [redacted] cries and realised what had happened. He was brought down semi-conscious. ^{about it} he recognised us, told us he wouldn't be long away from the company, and gave us instructions. The doctor said that he had no wound in any vital spot, though [redacted]

 the skin of his left side ^{was} riddled ^{as we had seen,} with the chalky soil blown up against him. We felt a relief in his case as in David's that he would be out of it for a while.

Then news came that David had died. The regimental doctor, a throat specialist in civil life, had told him at the dressing-station "You'll be all right, only don't raise your head for a bit." David had then, it was said, taken a letter from his pocket, given it to an orderly, and said "Post that." It was a letter written to a girl in Glamorgan to be posted in case he got killed.
 Then the doctor saw that he was choking; he tried trachotomy, but it was too late. Edmund and I were talking together in the company headquarters about one o'clock when the adjutant came in. He looked ghastly.
 He told us that Richardson had died at the dressing station.
 His heart had been weakened by rowing (he had been in the Eight at Radley) and the explosion and the cold water had been too much for it. The adjutant said to me nervously
 "You know, somehow I feel, I --- I feel responsible in a way for this; what I said yesterday at Trafalgar Square.
 Of course, really, I don't believe in superstition but..."
 Just at that moment there was a noise of whizz-bang shells about twenty yards off; a cry of alarm, followed by "Stretcher bearers." The adjutant turned quite white and we knew without being told what it meant. We hurried out. Pritchard, having fought his duel all night and finally silenced the enemy, was coming off duty. A whizz-bang had caught him at the point where the communication trench reached Maple Redoubt; it was a direct hit. The casualties of that night were three officers and one corporal.

It seemed ridiculous, when we returned without Richardson to A Company billets, to find "Triste La Guerre" still alive and to hear her quaver out "triste, la guerre" once more when her daughter explained that the jeune capitaine had been killed. The old woman had taken a fancy to the jeune capitaine, ~~we used to chaff him~~ ^{about it} I felt David's death worse than any other death since I had been in France. It did not anger me as it did Siegfried. He was acting transport officer and every night now, when he came up with the rations, he went out on patrol looking for Germans. It ~~just~~ made me feel empty and lost.

Insert
overleaf *

I knew that my breaking point was near now, unless something happened to stave it off. It was not that I was frightened. Certainly I feared death; but I had never yet lost my head through fright, and I knew that ^{I never} would.

Nor would the breakdown come as insanity; ^{not have it in me} It would be a general nervous collapse, with tears and twitchings and dirtied trousers.

I had seen ^{cases like that} One of the anthems that we used to sing ^{was} "He that shall endure to the end, Shall be saved." The words repeated themselves in my head like a charm whenever things were bad. "Though thousands languish and fall beside thee, And tens of thousands around thee perish, Yet still it shall not come nigh thee". And there was another bit, "To an inheritance incorruptible..... Through faith unto salvation,

Ready to be revealed at the last trump." For "trump" we always used to sing "crump". "The last crump" was the end of the war and would we ever hear it burst safely behind us? [REDACTED] I wondered whether [REDACTED] I could endure to the end, with faith unto salvation. * insert from overleaf

The Battalion was issued with a new gas-helmet popularly known as "the goggle-eyed b-- with the tit." It differed from the previous models. One breathed in through the nose from inside the helmet and breathed out through a special valve held in the mouth. I found that I could not manage this. Boxing with an already broken nose had recently displaced the septum so that I was forced to breathe through my mouth. In a gas-attack I would be unable to use the helmet and it was the only type claimed to be proof against the new German gas. The battalion doctor advised me to have an operation done as soon as I could.

These months with the First Battalion have already been twice recorded in literary history; though in both cases in a disguise of names and characters. The two books are ^{Siegfried} Sassoon's Memoirs of a Fox-Hunting Man [REDACTED] and Nothing of Importance, [REDACTED] by Bill Adams, the battalion sniping and intelligence officer. Adam's book was not much noticed, but was as ^{informative} a book as [REDACTED] ¹⁹¹⁷ censorship allowed; it should be re-printed. Adams was killed; in fact three out of five of the officers of the First Battalion at that time were killed in the Somme fighting. Scatter's dream of open warfare was not realised; he himself was very seriously wounded. Of A. company choir there is one survivor besides myself — C.D. Morgan, who had his thigh smashed and was still in hospital sometime after the war ended.

Ready to be revealed at the last trumpet. For "Trump" we always used to sing "Trump". "The last trumpet" was the end of the war and would we ever hear it again

I [redacted] safely [redacted] but successful for something [redacted] operation performed by

It differed from the previous model. One treated in through the nose from inside the helmet and retained out through a special valve laid in the mouth. I found that I could not manage this. I tried with an already broken nose had recently displaced the septum so that I was forced to breathe through my mouth. In a gas-attack I would be unable to use the helmet and it was the only type claimed to be proof against the new German gas. The hospital doctor advised me to have an operation [redacted] These months with the first Battalion have already been twice recorded in literary history; though in both cases in a disguise of names and characters. The two books are [redacted] a Fox-Hunting Man [redacted] operation performed by [redacted] [redacted] and Noting of Impotence. [redacted] by Bill Adams, the Battalion squire and intelligence officer. Adams' book was not much noticed, but [redacted] a book as [redacted] censorship allowed; it should be re-printed. Adams was killed; in fact three out of five of the officers of the first Battalion at that time were killed in the same fighting. Scatter's dream of open warfare was not realized; he himself was very seriously wounded. Of A. company's men there is one survivor besides myself--C.D. Morgan, who had his right amazing and was still in hospital some time after the war ended

CHAPTER XVIII.

When I came home on leave in April I went to a military hospital in London and had my nose operated ^{ed on}. It ^{was} a painful operation but performed by a first-class surgeon and ^{cost me nothing}. In peace time it would have cost me sixty guineas and another twenty guineas ⁱⁿ nursing home-fees. After hospital I went up to Harlech to walk on the hills. I had in mind the verse of the psalm "I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills, from whence cometh my help." That was another charm against trouble. I bought a small two-roomed cottage from my mother who owned ^{considerable} cottage property in the neighbourhood. I bought it in defiance of the war, as something to look forward to when the guns stopped (when the guns ^{stop} was how we always thought of the end of the war). I whitewashed the cottage and put in a table, a chair, a bed and ^{a few dishes and} ^{looking outside}. I ^{decided} to live there by myself on bread and butter, bacon and eggs, lettuce in season, ^{cabbage} and coffee and to write poetry. My war-bombs would keep me ^{for} for a year or two at least. The cottage was on the hillside away from the village. I put in a big window to look out over the wood below and across the Morfa to the sea. I wrote two or three poems here as a foretaste of the good life coming after the war.

It was ^{about this time} ^{but whether before or} ^{after my operation} I cannot remember, that I was taken by my father to a dinner of the Honorable Society of Cymmrodorion - a Welsh literary society - where Lloyd George, then Prime Minister, and W. M. Hughes, the Australian Prime Minister, were to speak. Hughes was jerky, dry and to the point. Lloyd George was up in the air on one of his ^{'glory of the'} 'Welsh Hills' speeches. The power of his rhetoric was uncanny. I knew that ^{the substance of} what he was saying was commonplace, idle and false but I had to fight hard against abandoning myself with the rest of the audience. The power I knew was not his; he sucked it from ^{the audience} ^{he has heard} and threw it back at them. Afterwards ^{my father} introduced me to him and when I looked closely at his eyes they were like those of a sleep-walker.

I rejoined the Third Battalion at Litherland near Liverpool, where it had been shifted from Wrexham as part of the Mersey defence force; I liked the Third Battalion. The new sentence with did not omit always

When I came home on leave in April I went to a military hospital in London and had my nose operated on a painful operation but performed by a first class surgeon
In those days it would have cost me sixty guineas and another twenty guineas nursing home-fee. After hospital I went up to Harlow to walk on the hills. I had in mind the verse of the psalm "I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills, from whence cometh my help." That was another charm against trouble. I found a small two-roomed cottage from my mother who owned a cottage property in the neighbourhood.
I bought it in reliance of the war, as something to look forward to. I had a go round word of play the rôle of Encyclopaedia; some opinion rather than knowledge.
with humorous inoffensiveness) mentor?

If I was about the time after my operation I cannot remember, but was taken by my father to a business of the Harlow Society
-What a library except - where they kept then Prince Minister, and W. M. Hopkins, the Australian Prince Minister, were to speak.
Hopkins was jumpy, but went to the point.

They kept people who up in the air on one of his "black hills" speeches. The power of his rhetoric was enormous. I think that I had one saying was commonplace, like one before but I had to fight hard against a myself with the rest of the audience. The power I know was not his; he checked it from the
and then it took of them. Afterwards
I had to see to his case when I was at his eyes they were like those of a

Liverpool, where it had been shifted from the Jersey before that; I lived the
the

236 B

[redacted] senior officers were generous in not putting ^{more} [redacted] work on me ^{than I wished to undertake} and it was ^{Wrexham} [redacted] good to meet again ^{Three} [redacted] of my contemporaries who had been severely wounded (all of them, by ^a coincidence, in the left thigh) and seemed to be out of it for the rest of the war. [redacted] Frank Jones-Bateman and "Father" Watkin, who had been in the Welsh Regiment with me, and ^{Hubrey} [redacted] Attwater ^{LTZ assistant-adjutant,} who had gone to the Second Battalion ^{early in 1915} and had been hit when out on patrol. Attwater had come from Cambridge at the outbreak of war and was known as "Brains" in the battalion. The [redacted] militia majors who [redacted] were for the most part country gentlemen with estates in Wales and ^{in peace-time,} ~~no thoughts~~ beyond hunting, shooting ~~and~~ fishing and the control of their tenantry, were delighted with Attwater's informative talk over the port at mess. Sergeant Malley, the mess sergeant, would ^{go} ~~bring~~ round with his "Light or vintage, sir?" and the old majors would say to Attwater, "Now, Brains. Tell us about Shakespeare. Is it true that Bacon wrote him?" Or, "Well, Brains. What do you think about this chap Hilaire Belloc? Does he really know ~~anything about~~ when the war's going to end?" And Attwater would ^{combined} ~~humorously~~ accept his position as ^{and almanack.} encyclopaedia. Sergeant Malley was another friend ^{whom} ~~that~~ I was always pleased to meet again. He could pour more wine into a glass than any ^{taken} ~~man~~ in the world; it bulged up over the top of the glass like a cap and he was never known to spill a drop.

[redacted] the camp was ^X [redacted] only separated by the bombing-field from Brotherton's, where [redacted] a specially sensitive explosive for detonators. ^{X was made} The munition makers [redacted] had permanently yellow faces senior officers were generous in not putting work on me and it was good to meet again of my contemporaries who had been severely wounded (all of them by coincidence in the left thigh) and seemed to be out of it for the rest of the war. Frank Jones-Bateman and "Father" Watkin who had been in the Welsh Regiment with me, and Atwater who had gone to the Second Battalion and had been hit when out on patrol. Atwater had come from Cambridge at the outbreak of war and was known as "Brains" in the battalion.

238

 The militia major ~~was~~ ^{nobody of any importance} was for the most part ~~was~~ ^{was} generally, were delighted with Atwater's informative talk over the port at mess. Sergeant Malley, the mess sergeant, would see round with his "light or vintage, sir" and the subjects would be "Brains", "low Brains". Tell us about Shakespeare. Is it true that Bacon wrote him? Or "Well, Brains. What do you think about this chap Hilaire Belloc?

 Does he really know what's going on when the war's going to end?" And Atwater would humbly accept his position as ^{not they. It}

condition which had permanently yellow faces and hands and drew appropriately high wages. Attwater ~~_____~~ ~~_____~~ used to argue at mess sometimes what would happen if Brotherton's blew up. Most ~~_____~~ held that the shock would immediately kill all the three thousand men of the camp ~~_____~~ ^{besides} ~~_____~~ destroying Litherland and a large part of Boctle. He maintained that the very closeness of the camp would save it; that the vibrations would go over and strike a big munition camp about a mile away and set that off. One Sunday afternoon ~~_____~~ Attwater limped out of the mess and suddenly saw smoke rising from Brotherton's.

 Part of the building was on fire. The camp five-brigade was immediately bugled for and managed to put the fire out before it reached ^a ~~the~~ vital spot. So the argument was never decided.
 I was only a few weeks at Litherland. On July 1st 1916 ~~the~~ Somme offensive started ~~and~~ and all available trained men and officers were sent out to replace casualties. ~~_____~~ I was disappointed to be sent back to the Second Battalion, not the First.

~~_____~~ ^{It was} in trenches at Givenchy, just the other side of the canal from the Guinchey ^{Brick} ~~Stacks~~. I arrived at the battalion on July 5th to find it in the middle of a raid. Prisoners were coming down the trench, scared and chattering to each other. They were Saxons just returned ^{from} ~~_____~~ a divisional rest, and a week's leave to Germany. Their uniforms were new and their packs full of good stuff to loot. One prisoner got a good talking to from C, company Sergeant-major, who was a Birmingham man, shocked at a packet of indecent photographs found in the man's haversack. It had been a retaliatory raid. Only a few days before ~~the~~ the Germans had sent up the biggest mine blown so far on the Western Front. ~~It~~ caught our B. Company ~~the~~ the B's were proverbially unlucky. The crater, which was afterwards named Red Dragon Crater after the Royal Welch regimental badge, must have been about fifty yards across. There were few survivors of B. company. The Germans immediately came over in force to catch the other companies in confusion. Stanway, who had been a company ^xsergeant-major on the Retreat and was now an acting ^xmajor, rallied some men on the flank and drove them back. Blair, B. company commander, was buried by the mine up to his neck and for the rest of the day was constantly under fire. Though an oldish man (he had the South African ribbon), ^xhe survived this experience, recovered ^xfrom his wounds and was back in the battalion a few months later.

This raid was Stanway's revenge. He organized it with the ^eColonel; the colonel was the ^{Third Battalion} Depot adjutant who had originally sent me out to France. The raid was elaborately planned, ^xwith bombardments and smoke-screen diversions on the flanks. A barrage of shrapnel shifted forward and back from the German front line to the supports. The intention was that the Germans at the ^xfirst bombardment ^xshould go down into the shell-proof dug-outs, leaving only their sentries in the trench, and reappear as soon as the barrage lifted. When it came down again they would make another dash for the dug-outs. After this had happened two or three times they would be slow in coming out at all. Then, ^xunder cover of a smoke screen, the raid would be made and the barrage put down uninterruptedly on the support and reserve lines to prevent reinforcements. My only part in the ^xraid ^{which was successful,} was to write out a detailed record of it at the colonel's request. It was not the report for divisional headquarters but a page of regimental history to be sent to the Depot to be filed in regimental records. In my account I noted that for the first time for two hundred years the regiment had reverted to the pike. ~~_____~~ ~~_____~~ Instead of rifle and bayonet some of the raiders had used butcher's knives secured have been about fifty yards across. There were few survivors of B. company. The Germans immediately came over in force to catch the other companies in confusion. ~~Stanway~~ who had been a company sergeant-major on the Harriet and was now an acting major, rallied some men on the flank and drove them back.

Blair, B. company commander, was buried by the mine up to his neck and for the rest of the day was constantly under fire.
Though an older man (he had the South African ribbon) he survived this experience, recovered his wounds and in back in the battalion a few months later.
This raid was Stanway's revenge. He organized it with the Colonel the Colonel was the ~~sergeant~~ lieutenant who had originally sent me out to France. The raid was elaborately planned with bombardments and smoke-screen diversions on the flanks. A barrage of shrapnel shifted forward and back from the German front line to the supports. The intention was that the Germans at the first bombardment ~~would~~ go down into the shell-proof dug-outs, leaving only their sentries in the trench and support as soon as the barrage lifted. When it came down again they would make another dash for the dug-outs.
After this had happened two or three times they would be slow in coming out at all. Then under cover of a smoke screen the raid would be made and the barrage put down unintermittently on the support and reserve lines to prevent reinforcements.
My only part in the raid was to write out a detailed record of it at the Colonel's request. ~~It was not the report for~~ divisional headquarters but a page of regimental history to be sent to the Depot to be filed in regimental records. In my account I noted that for the first time for two hundred years the regiment had reverted to the rifle. ~~The rifle~~ ~~and~~ ~~instead of rifle and~~ because some of the riflemen had used pattern's rifles acquired raised at Lewisham by my German name, with medical plaster to the end of broomsticks. This pike was a lighter weapon than rifle and bayonet and was useful in conjunction with bombs and revolvers.

An official journalist at Headquarters also wrote an account of the raid. The battalion enjoyed the bit about how they had gone over shouting "Remember Kitchener" and "Avenge the Lusitania!" "What a dam silly thing to shout," said someone. "Old Kitchener was all right but nobody wants him back at the War Office, that I've heard. And as for the Lusitania, the Germans gave her full warning and if it brings the States into the War it's all to the good." There were not many officers in the Second who had been with it when I ~~left~~ left it a month after Loos, but I expected (at any rate) to have a friendlier welcome than the first time I had come to the battalion at Laventie. But, as one of them recorded in his diary, "Graves had a chilly reception, which surprised me." The reason was simple. One of the officers who had joined the Third Battalion in August 1914 and had been on the Square with me had achieved his ambition of a regular commission in the Second Battalion. He was one of those who had been sent out to France before me as being more efficient and had been wounded before I came out. But now he was only a second-lieutenant in the Second Battalion, where promotion was slow, and I was a Captain in the Third Battalion. Line-battalion feeling against the Special Reserve was always strong, and jealousy of my extra stars made him bitter. It amused him to revive the suspicion ^{raised at Wrexham by} ~~my~~ German name ~~was~~ ^{It is!} ~~was~~ a German spy. Whether he was serious or not I cannot say, probably he could not have said either; but the result was that I found myself treated with great reserve by all the officers who had not been with me in trenches before. It was unlucky that the most notorious German spy with medical classes at the end of promontories. This like was a lighter weapon than rifle and bayonet and was useful in conjunction with bombs and revolvers.

 An official journal at headquarters also wrote an account of the raid. The battalion enjoyed the bit about how they had gone over shouting "Kommender Kitchener" and "Avance" the German side "not 'regni' my brother, but someone. "Old Kitchener was all right, but I don't want him back at the front. I say: Corius Conrad, whose husband was German Consul of Zurich, leave out about your employment. Paul - 7 employment Zurich, how corresp. was possible.
 a friendlier welcome than the first that I had come to the battalion at Laventie. But, as one of them recorded in his diary "Graves had a chilly reception, which surprised me."
 The reason was simple. One of the officers who had joined the Third Battalion in August 1914 and had been on the square with me had achieved his ambition of a regular commission in the Second Battalion. He was one of those who had been sent out to France before me as being more efficient and had been wounded before I came out. But now he was only a second-lieutenant in the Second Battalion where promotion was slow and I was a captain in the Third Battalion. His battalion feeling against the Special Reserve was always strong and whenever his advice was not taken things went wrong [redacted] like [redacted] that [redacted] was a German spy. Whether he was serious or not I cannot say. Probably he could not have said either but the result was that I found myself treated with great reserve by all the officers who had not been with me in France before. It was unlikely that the most notorious German spy

I thought I had myself had no further with the enemy caught in England had assumed the name of Karl Graves. It was put about that he was a brother of mine.

My consolation was that there was obviously a battle due and that would be the end either of me or of the suspicion. I thought to myself, "so long as there isn't an N.C.O. told off to watch me and shoot me on the slightest ^{appearance of treachery}" Such things had been known.

As a matter of fact there was a desultory correspondence kept up between my mother and her ^{sister} in Germany; it came through her sister Clara von Faber du Faur, mother of my cousin Conrad, (at Zurich) whose husband was German Consul. It was not treasonable on either side, merely a register of the deaths of relations and discreet references to the war-service of the survivors. The German aunts ^{wrote} as the Government had ordered every German with relations or friends in enemy or neutral countries to do, ^{pointing} out the righteousness of the German cause and ^{presenting} Germany as the innocent party in a war engineered by France and Russia. My mother, equally strong for the Allied cause, ^{also wrote} back that they were deluded.

The officers I liked in the battalion were the Colonel ^{and} and Captain Dunn, the battalion doctor.

Doctor Dunn was what they call a "hard-bitten" man; he had served as a trooper in the South African war and won the D.C.M. He was far more than a doctor; living at battalion headquarters he became the right-hand man of three or four colonels in succession. When ^{his} his advice was not taken ^{he} was usually ^{afterwards} ~~repented~~ ^{repented}. On one occasion, in the autumn fighting of 1917, a shell burst among the headquarters staff, knocking out adjutant, colonel, and signals officer. Dunn had no hesitation in pulling off the red-cross armlets that he wore in ^d battle and becoming a temporary combatant officer of the Royal Welch, resigning his duties to the stretcher-bearer-sergeant. He took command and kept things going. The men were rather afraid of him but had more respect for him than for anyone ^{else} in the battalion.

Somme. We marched through Bethune, which had been ^{knocked} ~~knocked~~ about and was ^{nearly} ~~almost~~ deserted, to Fouquières, and there entrained for the Somme. The ^{Somme} rail-head was near Amiens and we marched by easy stages through Cardonette, Daours, and Buire until we came to the original front line, close to the place where David had been killed. The fighting had moved two miles on. This was on the afternoon of July 14th. At 4 a.m. on the 15th

24

(about which Siegfried wrote a poem The Road)

of July we moved up the Méaulte-Fricourt-Bazentin road which wound through "Happy Valley" and found ourselves in the more recent battle area. Wounded men and prisoners came streaming past us. What struck me most was the number of dead horses and mules lying about; human corpses I was accustomed to, but it seemed wrong ~~for~~ ^x for ~~animals~~ ^x animals to be dragged into the war like this. We marched by platoons, at fifty yards distance. Just beyond Fricourt we found a German shell-barrage across the road. So we left it and moved over thickly shell-pitted ground until ~~8 a.m.~~ ^x 8 a.m. ^x when we found ourselves on the fringe of Mametz Wood, among the dead of ~~our own~~ ^x our own new-army battalions that had been attacking Mametz Wood. We halted in thick mist. The Germans had been using lachrimatory shell and the mist held the fumes; we coughed and swore. We tried to smoke but the gas had got into the cigarettes, ~~and~~ ^x so ~~we~~ ^x we threw them away. Later we wished we had not, because it was not the cigarettes that had been affected so much as our own throats. The ⁴ Colonel called up the officers and we pulled out our maps. We were expecting orders for an attack. When the mist cleared we saw a German gun with "First ^B Battalion Royal Welch Fusiliers" chalked on it. It was evidently a trophy. I wondered what had happened to Siegfried and my friends of A. company. We found the battalion quite close in bivouacs; Siegfried was still alive, ^x as were Edmund Daid and two other A. company officers. The battalion had been in ~~heavy~~ ^{heavy} fighting. In their first attack at Fricourt they had overrun our opposite number in the German army, the 23rd Infantry Regiment, who were undergoing a special disciplinary spell in the trenches because an inspecting staff-officer, ^x coming round, ^x had found that all the officers were back in Fricourt village in a deep dug-out instead of up in

24

(about which I had written from the front) of July we moved up the narrow, tree-lined road which wound through "Happy Valley" and found ourselves in the zone where battle was being fought. Wounded men and prisoners came streaming past us. That struck me most was the number of dead horses and mules lying about; human corpses I was accustomed to, but it seemed wrong for animals to be dragged into the war like this. We marched by platoons, at fifty yards distance. Just beyond the point we found a German shell-battery across the road. As we left it and moved over thickly shell-pitted ground until 8 a.m. we found ourselves on the fringe of Kamatz Wood, among the dead of our own battalions that had been attacking Kamatz Wood. We halted in thick mist. The Germans had been using incendiary shells and the mist hid the forest; we coughed and swore. We tried to smoke but the gas had got into the cigarettes. ~~Later we wished we had not~~ because it was not the cigarettes that had been affected so much as our own throats. The Colonel called up the officers and we pulled out our maps. We were expecting orders for an attack. When the mist cleared we saw a German gun with "First Battalion Royal Welsh Fusiliers" inscribed on it. It was evidently a trophy. I wondered what had happened to the and my friends of A. company. We found the battalion pulled close in bivouac; slightly was still alive and were about half and two other A. company officers. The battalion had been in bivouac at the point of the road.

Don't say it appears in my ^{name} collected seems. I don't say give the name a rhymed letter (name in parent)
 previously (which appears etc)

the trenches with their men; it was said that ~~that~~ ^{throughout} that bad time in March in the German trenches opposite to us there had been no officer of higher rank than corporal. Their next objective had been The Quadrangle, a small wood this side of Mametz Wood. I was told that Siegfried had then distinguished himself by taking single handed a battalion frontage that the Royal Irish Regiment had failed to take the day before. He had gone over with bombs in daylight, under covering fire from a couple of rifles, and scared the occupants out. ~~It~~ ^{It} was a ~~pointless~~ ^{pointless} feat; ~~instead~~ ^{instead} of reporting or signalling for reinforcements he sat down in the German trench and began ~~reading~~ ^{dozing over} a book of poems which he had brought with him. When he finally went back and reported the Colonel was furious. The attack on Mametz Wood had been delayed for two hours because it was reported that British patrols were still out. "British patrols" were Siegfried and his book of poems. "It would have got you a D.S.O. if you'd only had more sense," stormed the Colonel. Siegfried had been doing ~~things~~ ^{heroic} things ever since I ~~left~~ ^{had} left the battalion. His nickname in the Seventh Division was "Mad Jack". He was given a Military Cross for bringing in a wounded lance-corporal from a mine-crater close to the German lines, under heavy fire. He Siegfried was one of the rare exceptions to the rule against ~~the decoration of~~ ^{the decoration of} Third Battalion officers. ~~I did not see~~ ^{I did not see} Siegfried this time; he was down at the transport having a rest. So I sent him a rhymed letter, by one of our own transport men, about the times that we were going to have together ~~when the war ended, how after a rest at Hadleigh we were going for a visit to the Caucasus and Persia & China, and what good poetry we were going to write.~~ ^{when the war ended, how after a rest at Hadleigh we were going for a visit to the Caucasus and Persia & China, and what good poetry we were going to write.} ~~was in~~ ^{was in}

It was in answer to one he had written to me from the army-school at Flixécourt a few weeks previously (which appears in The Old Huntsman).

243

I went for a stroll with Edmund Dadd, who was now commanding A. Company. Edmund was cursing! "It's not fair, Robert, you remember A. Company under Richardson was always the best company. Well, it's kept up its reputation, and the C.O. shoves us in as the leading company of every show, and we get our objectives and hold them, and so we've got to do the same again the next time. And he says that I'm indispensable in the company, so he makes me go over every time instead of giving me a rest and letting my second-in-command take his turn. I've had five shows in just over a fortnight and I can't go on being lucky every time. The Colonel's ^{about Jul} ~~sure~~ for his C.B. . Apparently A. company is ^{making sure of} it for him."

^{For} ~~The~~ next two days we were in bivouacs outside the wood. We were in fighting kit and the nights were ^{wet &} cold. I went into the wood to find German overcoats to use as blankets. Mametz Wood was full of dead of the Prussian Guards Reserve, big men, and of Royal Welch and South Wales Borderers of the new-army battalions, little men. There was not a single tree in the wood unbroken. I got my greatcoats ~~as quickly as I could,~~ climbing over the wreckage of green branches, ~~and came away~~ going and coming, by the only possible route, I had to pass by the corpse of a German with his back propped against a tree. He had a green face, spectacles, close shaven hair; black blood was dripping from the nose and beard. He had been there for some days and was bloated and stinking. There had been bayonet fighting in the wood. There was a man of the South Wales Borderers and one of the Lehr regiment who had succeeded in bayonetting each other ^{simultaneously}. A survivor of the fighting told me later that he had seen a young soldier of the ¹⁴ Royal Welch bayonetting a German in parade-ground style, automatically exclaiming as he had been taught ~~X~~: "In, out, on guard." He said it was the oddest thing he had ~~heard~~ in France.

I found myself ^{still} ~~very~~ superstitious about looting or collecting souvenirs. ~~I felt that the things I had taken were only a loan, I told myself. Almost the only souvenir I had allowed myself to keep was a trench periscope; ~~as~~ a little rod-shaped metal one sent me from home; ~~and~~ when I poked it up above the parapet it offered only an inch-square target to the German snipers. Yet a sniper at Guinchey drilled it through, exactly central, at four hundred yards range. I sent it home, but had no time to ~~send~~ ^{write} a note of explanation. My mother, misunderstanding, and practical as usual, took it back to the makers and made them change it for a new one.~~

Our brigade, the 19th, was the reserve brigade of the 33rd Division; the other brigades, the 99th and 100th, had attacked Martinpuich two days previously ^{and} had been stopped with heavy losses as soon as they started. Since then we had had nothing to do but sit about in shell-holes and watch the artillery duel going on. We had never seen artillery so thick ^{as before} ~~as they were in the Valley~~. On the 18th we moved up to a position just to the north of Bazentin le Petit to relieve the Tyneside Irish. It was a difficult relief. The guide who was taking us up was hysterical and had forgotten the way; we put him under arrest and found ~~it was a~~ ^{it was a} ~~road~~. As we went up through the ruins of the village we were shelled. We were accustomed to that, but they were gas shells. The standing order with regard to gas shells was not to put on one's respirator but hurry on. ~~As we went up~~ ^{up} to that week there had been no gas shells except lachrimatory ones; these were the first of the real kind, so we lost about half a dozen men. When at last we arrived at the trenches, which were scooped at a roadside and only about three feet deep, the company we were relieving hurried out without any of the usual formalities; they had been badly shaken. I asked their officer where the Germans were. He said he didn't know, but pointed vaguely towards Martinpuich, a mile to our front on our right^x. I asked where ~~the Germans were~~ ^{and what were the troops} on our left. He didn't know. I cursed him and he went off. We got into touch with D. Company behind us on the right and with the 4th Suffolks not far off on the left. We began deepening the trenches and locating the Germans; they were in a trench-system about five hundred yards away but keeping fairly quiet.

The next day there was very heavy shelling at noon; shells were bracketting along our trench about five yards short and five yards over, but never quite getting it. We were having dinner and three times running my cup of tea was spilt by the concussion and filled with dirt. I was in a cheerful mood ~~and~~ ^{and} ~~only~~ ^{only} laugh^{ed}. I had just had a parcel of kippers from home; they were far more important than the ^{bombardment} ~~the~~. I recalled with appreciation one of my mother's sayings: "Children, remember this when you eat your kippers: ^{kippers} ~~they~~ cost little, yet if ~~they~~ ^{they} cost a hundred guineas a pair they would still find ^{buyers} ~~them~~ among the millionaires." ~~It~~ ^{the shelling} ~~had~~ ^{had} started a tame magpie ^{had} ~~to~~ ^{come} in to the trench; it ^{apparently} ~~had~~ belonged to the Germans who had been driven out of the village by the Gordon Highlanders a day or two before. It was looking very draggled. "That's one for sorrow," I said. The men swore that it spoke something in German as it came in, but I didn't ^{not} hear it. I was feeling tired and was off duty, so without waiting for the bombardment to stop I went to sleep in the trench. I decided ^{that} I would just as soon be killed asleep as awake. There were no dug-outs, of course. I always found it easy now to sleep through bombardments; I was conscious of the noise in my sleep but I let it go by. Yet if anybody came to wake me for my watch or shouted "Stand to" I was alert in a second. I had learned to go to sleep sitting down, standing up, marching, lying on a scoped at a roadside and only about three feet deep, the company was relieved hurried out without any of the usual formalities, they had been badly shaken. I asked their officer where the Germans were. He said he didn't know, but pointed vaguely towards Martinich, a mile to our front on our right. I asked where ~~the tanks~~ on our left. He didn't know. I cursed him and he went off.

 We got into touch with E. Company behind us on the right and with the 4th Buffalo not far off on the left. We began dropping the trenches and locating the Germans; they were in a trench-system about five hundred yards away but keeping fairly quiet.

The next day there was very heavy shelling at noon;
 shells were practising along our trench about five yards short and five yards over, but never quite getting it. We were having dinner and three times turning a cup of tea was split by the concussion and filled with dirt. I was in a cheerful mood ~~and only faintly~~ I had just had a parcel

I recalled with appreciation one of my mother's sayings:
 "Children, remember this when you see your kippers:
~~cost little yet it~~ cost a hundred ~~thousands~~ a pair they would still find ~~among the millionaires~~ been driven out of the village by the German Highlanders a day or two before. It was looking very dreary. "That's one for sorrow," I said. The men were that it spoke something in German as it came in, but I didn't hear it. I was feeling that I tried to find a charm to get me safely by him. The simplest way was

 I was conscious of the noise in my sleep but I got it go by. Yet if anybody came to visit me for my watch or

He looked horrible in the moonlight!
I tried to find a charm to get me safely by him. The simplest
way was

stone floor, or in any other position, at a moment's notice at any time of day or night. But ~~now~~ I had a dreadful nightmare; ~~it~~ it was as though somebody was handling me secretly, choosing the place to drive a knife into me. Finally he gripped me in the small of the back. I woke up with a start, shouting, and punched the small of my back where the hand was. I found that I had killed a mouse that had been frightened by the bombardment and run down my neck.

That afternoon the company got an order through from ^{the} Brigade to build two cruciform strong points at such-and-such a map reference. Moodie, the Company commander, and I looked at our map and laughed. Moodie sent back a message that he would be glad to do so but would require an artillery bombardment and strong reinforcements because the points selected, half-way to Martinpuich, were occupied in force by the enemy. The colonel came up and verified this. He said ^{that} we should build the strong-points about three hundred yards forward and two hundred yards apart. So one platoon stayed behind in the trenches and the other ^s went out and started digging. A cruciform strong-point consisted of two trenches, ^{each some thirty yards long,} crossing at right angles to each other; it was wired all round, ^{so that it} and looked, in diagram, like a hot-cross bun. The defenders could bring fire to bear against an attack from any direction. We were to hold each of these points with a Lewis gun and a platoon of men.

It was a bright moonlight night. My way to the strong-point on the right took me along the Bazentin-High Wood road. A German Sergeant-major, wearing a pack and full equipment, was lying ^{on his back} in the middle of the road, ~~his~~ his arms stretched out ^{wide}. ~~He was a short powerful man with a full black beard.~~ He looked sinister in the moonlight; I needed a charm to get myself safely by him.

The simplest way ^(I found) was to cross myself. Apparently a brigade of the Seventh Division had captured the road and the Germans had been shelling it heavily. It was a sunken road and the defenders had begun to scrape fire-positions in the north bank, facing the Germans. ^{The work had apparently been interrupted} ~~by a~~ ~~counter-attack.~~ They had done no more than scrape hollows in the lower part of the bank. To a number of these little hollows wounded men had crawled, put their heads and shoulders inside and died there. ^{they} ~~It~~ looked as though they ^{had tried to} ~~would~~ hide from the black beard. They were Gordon Highlanders.

I was visiting the strong-point on the right. ~~_____~~
~~_____~~ The trench had ^{now} been dug two or three feet down and a party of Engineers had arrived with coils of barbed wire for the entanglement. I found that work ^{had} stopped. The whisper went round: "Get your rifles ready. Here comes Fritz." I lay down flat to see better and about seventy yards away in the moonlight I could make out massed figures. I immediately sent a man back to the company to find Moodie and ask him for a Lewis gun and a flare-pistol. I restrained the men, who were itching to fire, telling them to wait until they came closer. I said: "They probably don't know we're here, and we'll get more of them if we let them come right up close. They may even surrender." The Germans were wandering about irresolutely and we ^{wondered} ~~_____~~ what the game was ~~_____~~. There had been a number of ^{German} surrenders recently (at night) and this might be one on a big scale. Then Moodie came running with a Lewis gun, the flare-pistol and a few more men with rifle-grenades. He decided to give the enemy a chance. He sent up a flare and fired a Lewis-gun over their heads. A tall officer came running ^{towards us with his hands} up ~~to~~ in surrender. He was surprised to find that we were ^{not Germans} ~~_____~~. ^{that} He said he belonged to the Public Schools Battalion in our own ^{brigade} ~~_____~~. Moodie asked him what the hell he was doing. He said ^{that} he was in command of a patrol. He was sent back for a few more of his men, to make sure it was not a trick. The "patrol" was ~~about~~ half a company of men wandering about aimlessly between the lines, their rifles slung over their shoulders and, it seemed, without the faintest idea where they were or what ^{information} they were supposed to ~~bring back~~. This Public Schools Battalion was one of four or five others which had been formed some time in 1914. Their training had been continually interrupted by ~~large~~ large numbers of men ^{being} withdrawn as officers for other regiments. The only men left, in fact, seemed to be those who were unfitted to hold commissions; yet unfitted by their education to make good soldiers in the ranks. The other battalions had been left behind in England as training battalions; only this one had been sent out. It was a constant embarrassment to the ^{by} Brigade.

I picked up a souvenir that night. A German gun-team had been shelled as it was galloping out of Bazentin towards Martinpuich. The horses and the driver had been killed. At the back of the limber were the gunners' treasures. Among them was a large lump of chalk wrapped up in a piece of cloth; it had been carved and decorated in colours with military mottos, the flags of the Central Powers and the names of the various battles in which the gunner had served. I sent it as a present to ^{Doctor Dunn} ~~him~~. I am glad to say that both he and it survived the war; he is in practice in Glasgow and the lump of chalk is under a glass case in his consulting room. The evening of the next day, July 19th, we were relieved. We were told that we would be attacking High Wood, which we could see a thousand yards away to the right at the top of a slope. High Wood was on the main German battle-line which ran along the ridge, with Delville Wood, not far off, on the German left. Two ^{British} brigades had already attempted it; ⁴ in both cases the counter-attack had driven them out. Our battalion had had a large number of casualties and was now only about four hundred strong. I have kept a battalion order ~~issued~~, issued at midnight:-

was ~~some~~ half a company of men ~~standing~~ about aimlessly between the lines, their rifles slung over their shoulders and, it seemed, without the faintest idea where they were or what they were supposed to do. This ~~infantry~~ Battalion was one of four or five others which had been formed some time in 1914. Their training had been ~~entirely in-~~ ~~terrupted~~ by ~~large~~ numbers of non-commissioned officers for other regiments. The only men left, in fact, seemed to be those who were entitled to hold commissions; yet utilized by their education to make good soldiers in the ranks. The other battalions had been left behind in England as training battalions; only this one had been sent out. It was a constant embarrassment to the Brigade.

I picked up a souvenir that night. A German gas-mask had been snatched as it was galloping out of German hands ~~at the~~ ~~moment~~. The horse and the driver had been killed. At the back of the limber were the German weapons. ~~Many~~ ~~of~~ ~~them~~ ~~were~~ a large lump of chalk wrapped up in a piece of canvas; it had been carved and decorated in colors with military motifs, the face of the general ~~in~~ ~~the~~ ~~center~~ ~~and~~ ~~the~~ ~~names~~ ~~of~~ ~~the~~ ~~various~~ battalions in which the general had served. I took it as a present to ~~myself~~. I saw him ~~in~~ ~~the~~ ~~next~~ ~~day~~ ~~and~~ ~~he~~ ~~was~~ ~~in~~ ~~it~~ survived the war; he is in practice in Glasgow and the lump of chalk is under a glass case in his consulting room. The evening of the next day, July 19th, we were relieved. We were told that we would be attacking High Wood, which we could see a thousand yards away to the right at the top of a slope.
 High Wood was on the main German battle-line which ran along the ridge with Belleisle Wood, not far off on the German left.
 Two brigades had already attempted it; in both cases the counter-attack had driven them out. Our battalion had had a large number of casualties and was now only about four hundred strong. I have kept a battalion order ~~book~~ issued at midnight:-

To O.C. B. Co. 2nd R.W.F. 20.7.16.

Companies	will	move	as	under
to	same	position	in	S14b
as	were	to	have	been taken	over	from	Cameronians	aaa
	A Coy.	12.30 a.m.
	B Coy.	12.45 a.m.
	C Coy.	1 - a.m.
	D Coy.	1.15 a.m.	aaa
At	AV 2 a.m.	2 a.m. Company	Company Commanders	→ will	meet	C.O.	at	X
Roads	S14b 9.9	aaa
Men	will	lie	down	and get	under	cover	but	equipment
will	not	be	taken	off aaa

To printer regularize spaces
as in a telegraph
form,

S.14 b was a map reference for Bazentin churchyard. We lay ^{here} ~~there~~ on the reverse slope of a slight ridge about half-a-mile from the wood. I attended the meeting of company commanders; the colonel told us the plan. He said, "Look here, you fellows, we're in reserve ^{for} this attack. The Cameronians are going up to the Wood first, then the 5th Scottish Rifles; that's at 5 a.m. The Public Schools Battalion are in support if anything goes wrong. I don't know if we ~~will~~ ^{shall} be called on; if we are, it will mean that the Jocks have legged it. As usual," he added. This was an appeal to prejudice. "The Public Schools Battalion ~~is~~ ^{is} what we know, so if we are called for, that means it will be the end of us." He said this with a laugh and we all laughed. We were sitting on the ground protected by the road-bank; a battery of French '75's was firing ^{rapid} over our heads about twenty yards away. There was a very great concentration of guns in Happy Valley now. We could hardly hear what he was saying. He told us that if we did get orders to reinforce we were to shake out in artillery formation; once in the wood we were to hang on like death. Then he said good-bye and good luck, and we rejoined our companies. ~~At~~ ^{At} this juncture the usual inappropriate message came through from Division. Division could always be trusted to send through a warning about ~~verdi~~ ^{verdi}gris on vermoresl-sprayers, or the keeping of pets in trenches, or being polite to our allies, or some other triviality, when an attack was in progress. This time it was an order for a private in my company to report immediately to the Assistant Provost-Marshal back at Albert, under escort of a lance-corporal. He was for a court-martial. A sergeant of the company was also ordered to report as a witness in the case. The private was charged with ^{the} murder of a French civilian in an estaminet at Béthune about a month previously. Apparently there had been a good deal of brandy going and the French civilian, who had a grudge against the British (it was about his wife), started to tease the private. He was reported ^{as having said,} ^{somehow improbably,} "English no bon, Allmand très hon. War fineesh, napeo the English. Allmand win." The private had immediately drawn his bayonet and run the man through. At the court-martial the private was exculpated; the French civil representative commended him for having "energetically repressed local defeatism." So he and the two N.C.O's missed the battle.

What the battle that they missed was like I pieced together afterwards. The Jocks did get into the wood and the Royal Welch were not called on to ~~reinforce~~ ^{reinforce} until 11 o'clock ^{in the} morning. The Germans put down a barrage along the ridge where we were lying and we lost about a third of the battalion before our show started. I was one of the casualties.

It was heavy stuff, six and eight-inch. There was so much of it that we ~~decided~~ decided to move back fifty yards; it was when I was running that an eight-inch burst about three paces behind me. I was able to work that out afterwards by the line of my wounds. I heard the explosion and felt as though I had been punched rather hard between the shoulder-blades, but had no sensation of pain. I thought that the punch was merely the shock of the explosion, then blood started trickling into my eye and I felt faint and called to Moodie, "I've been hit." Then I fell down. A minute or two before I had had two very small wounds on my left hand; they were in exactly the same position as the two on my right hand ^{that I had taken} during the preliminary bombardment at Loos. This ^{as a sign that I would} ~~was~~ come through all right. For further security I ^{had} repeated to myself the line of Nietzsche's, whose poems, in French, I had with me:-

X "Non, tu ne me peux pas tuer."

It was the poem about a man on the scaffold with the red-bearded executioner standing over him. (This copy of Nietzsche, by the way, had contributed to the suspicions about me as a spy. Nietzsche was ^{x execrated} ~~mentioned~~ in the papers as the ^{x philosopher of} ~~the~~ German militarism; he was more popularly interpreted as a William le Queux mystery-man — the sinister figure behind the Kaiser.)

One piece of shell ^{x went} ~~hit~~ through my left thigh, high up near the groin; I must have been at the full stretch of my stride to have ^{x escaped emasculation} ~~been~~. The wound over the eye was nothing; it was a little chip of marble, possibly from one of the Bazentin cemetery headstones. This and a finger wound which split the bone probably came from another shell that burst in front of me. The main wound was ^{made by} ~~caused by~~ a piece of shell that went in two inches below the point of my right shoulder and came out through my chest two inches above my right nipple, in a line between ^{x it} ~~my~~ and the base of my neck.

My memory of what happened then is vague. Apparently ^{Doctor} Dunn came up through the barrage with a stretcher party, dressed my wound and got me down to the old German dressing-station at the north end of Mametz Wood. I just remember being put on the stretcher and winking at the stretcher-bearer sergeant who was looking at me and saying "Old Gravy's got it, all right." The dressing station was over-worked that day; I was laid in a corner on a stretcher and remained unconscious for more than twenty-four hours. It was about ten o'clock on the 20th that I was hit. Late that night the colonel came to the dressing station; he saw me lying in the corner and was told that I was done for. The next morning the 21st, when they were clearing away the dead, ^{X I was} found to be still breathing; so they put me on an ambulance for Heilly, the nearest field Hospital. The pain of being jolted down the Happy Valley with a shell-hole at every three or four yards of the roads woke me for ^{while. Remember screaming. But} once back on the better roads I became unconscious again. That morning the colonel ~~_____~~

~~_____~~
~~_____~~ ^{X That being done,} wrote the usual ^{formal} ~~_____~~ letters ^{of condolence} to the next-of-kin of the six or seven officers who had been killed. This was his letter to my mother:—

22.7.18.

Dear Mrs. Graves,

I very much regret to have to write and tell you your son has died of wounds. He was very gallant, and was doing so well and is a great loss.

He was hit by a shell and very badly wounded and died on the way down to the base I believe. He was not in bad pain and our doctor managed to get across and attend him at once.

We have had a very hard time, and our casualties have been large. Believe me you have all our sympathy in your loss, and we have lost a very gallant soldier.

Please write to me if I can tell you or do anything.

Yours sincerely,

X X X

253

It was a very casual list because only eight later he made out the official casualty list and reported me as died of wounds. ^{only eight} ^{in the} ^{left the} ^{battalion.}

Heilly was on the railway; close to the station was the hospital—marquee tents with the red cross painted prominently on the roofs to discourage air-bombing. It was fine July weather and the tents were insufferably hot. I was semi-conscious now and realised my lung-wound by the shortness of breath. I was amused to watch the little bubbles of blood, like ^{red} soap bubbles, that my breath made when it escaped through the hole of the wound. The doctor came over to me. I felt ~~so~~ sorry for him; he looked as though he had not had any sleep for days. I asked him for a drink. He said, "Would you like some tea?" I said, "Not if it has condensed milk in it." He said, "I'm afraid there's no fresh milk." Tears came to my eyes; I expected better of a hospital behind the lines. He said, "Will you have some water?" I said, "Not if it's boiled." ~~the water was boiled: it was~~

~~He~~ He said, "It is boiled. And I'm afraid I can't give you anything with alcohol in it in your present condition." I said, "Give me some fruit then." He said, "I have seen no fruit for days." But a few minutes later he came back with two rather unripe greengages. I felt so grateful that I promised him a whole orchard when I recovered. The nights of the 22nd and 23rd were very bad. Early on the morning of the 24th, when the Doctor came to see how I was, I said, "You must send me away from here. The heat will kill me." It was beating through the canvas on my head. He said, "Stick it out. It's your best chance to lie here and not to be moved. You'd not reach the Base alive," I said, "I'd like to risk the move. I'll be all right, you'll see." Half an hour later he came back. "Well, you're having it your way. I've just got orders to evacuate every case in the hospital. Apparently the Guards have been in it up

124

It was very dark and I was very tired. I had been on the same stretcher for some time. I was very weak and I was very tired. I was very weak and I was very tired.

Holly was on the railway; close to the station was the hospital—marquee tents with the red cross painted prominently on the roofs to discourage air-bombing. It was fine July weather and the tents were invariably hot. I was somewhat surprised now and realised my lung-wound by the shortness of breath. I was amazed to watch the little bubbles of blood like soap bubbles that my breath made when it escaped through the hole of the wound. The doctor came over to me. I felt sorry for him; he looked as though he had not had any sleep for days. I asked him for a drink. He said, "Would you like some tea?" I said, "Not if it has condensed milk in it." He said, "I'm afraid there's no fresh milk." Tears came to my eyes; I expected better of a hospital behind the lines. He said, "Will you have some water?" I said, "Not if it's polluted." ~~He said, "It is polluted. And I'm afraid I can't give you anything with alcohol in it in your present condition."~~ I said, "Give me some fruit then." He said, "I have seen no fruit for days." But a few minutes later he came back with two rather wrinkled greenapples. I felt so grateful that I promised him a whole orchard when I recovered. The night of the 23rd and 24th were very bad. Early on the morning of the 24th when the doctor came to see how I was, I said, "You must send me away from here. The boat will kill me." It was beating through the canvas on my head. He said, "Stick it out. It's your best chance to live here and not to be moved. You'd not reach the base alive." I said, "I'd like to risk the move. I'll be all right, you'll see." Half an hour later he came back. "Well, you're having it your way. I've just got orders to evacuate every case in the hospital. Apparently the Guards have been in it up

I had been on the same stretcher

I have on

I remember the journey only as nightmare

254

at Delville Wood and we'll have them all coming in to-night." I had no fears now about dying. I was ~~content~~ content to be wounded and on the way home.

I had been given news of the battalion from a brigade-major, wounded in the leg, who was in the next bed to me. He looked at my label and said, "I see you're in the Second Royal Welch Fusiliers. Well, I saw your High Wood show through field-glasses. The way your battalion shook out into artillery formation, company by company, ~~with~~ each section of four or five men in file at fifty yards interval and distance ~~going~~ going down into the hollow and up the slope through the barrage, was the most beautiful bit of parade-ground drill I've ever seen. Your company officers must have been superb." I happened to know that one company at least had started without a single officer. I asked him ~~whether~~ whether they held the Wood. He said, "They hung on at the near end. I believe what happened was that the Public Schools Battalion came away as soon as it got dark; and so did the Scotsmen. Your chaps were left there alone for some time. They steadied themselves by singing. Later Father McCabe brought the Scotsmen back. They were Glasgow Catholics and would follow a priest where they wouldn't follow an officer. The middle of the Wood was impossible for either the Germans or your fellows to hold. There was ~~a~~ a terrific concentration of artillery on it. ~~The trees~~ The trees were ~~matchwood~~ splintered to matchwood. Late that night the survivors were relieved by a brigade of the ~~Seventh~~ Division; your First Battalion was in it."

That evening I was put in the hospital train. They could not lift ~~the~~ ~~stretcher~~ ~~to~~ ~~put~~ ~~me~~ ~~on~~ ~~a~~ ~~bunk~~, for fear of starting haemorrhage in the lung; so they laid the stretcher ~~on~~ ~~top~~ ~~of~~ ~~it~~ with the handles resting on the head-rail and foot-rail. ~~I~~ ~~was~~ ~~on~~ ~~the~~ ~~same~~ ~~stretcher~~ ~~since~~ ~~I~~ ~~was~~ ~~wounded~~. ~~The~~ ~~journey~~ ~~was~~ ~~only~~ ~~a~~ ~~nightmare~~. ~~One~~

~~My back was sagging and I could not raise my knees to relieve the cramp because the bunk above me was only a few inches away. A German officer on the other side of the carriage, ^{groaned and wept} ~~groaned and wept~~ ^{unsuccessfully,} ~~unsuccessfully,~~~~

He had been in an aeroplane crash and had a compound fracture of the thigh. The other wounded men were cursing him and telling him to stow it and be a man, but he went on, ~~and~~ ^{peeping} ~~and~~ everyone awake. He was not delirious, only frightened and in great pain. An orderly gave me a pencil and paper and I wrote home to say that I was wounded but all right. This was July 24th, my twenty-first birthday, and it was on this day, ^{when I arrived at Rouen,} that my officially death occurred.

My parents got my letter two days after the letter from the colonel; mine was dated July 23rd because I had lost count of ~~my~~ ^x days when I was unconscious; his was dated the 22nd*. They could not decide whether my letter had been written just before I died and mis-dated, or whether I had died just after writing it. "Died of wounds" was, however, so much more circumstantial than "killed" that they gave me up. I was in No. 2 Hospital at Rouen; an ex-chateau high above the town. The day after I arrived a Cooper aunt of mine, who had married a Frenchman, came ~~to the hospital~~ ^{to the hospital}

*as a footnote * I cannot explain the discrepancy between his dating of my death and that of the published casualty list.*

~~to~~ to visit a nephew in the South Wales Borderers who had just had a leg amputated. ~~She~~ ^x She happened to see my name ^{in a list} on the door of the ward, so she wrote to my mother to reassure her. On the 30th I had a letter from the colonel:-

30.7.16.

"Dear von Runl etc,

I cannot tell you how pleased I am you are alive. I was told your number was up for certain, and a letter was supposed to have come in from Field Ambulance saying you had gone under.

Well it's good work. We had a rotten time and after succeeding in doing practically the impossible we collected that rotten crowd and put them in their places, but directly dark came they legged it. It was too sad.

"We lost heavily. It is not fair putting brave men like ours alongside that crowd. I also wish to thank you for your good work and bravery and only wish you could have been with them. I have read of bravery but I have never seen such magnificent and wonderful disregard for death as I saw that day. It was almost uncanny it was so great. I once heard an old officer in the Royal Welch say the men would follow you to Hell, but these chaps would bring you back and put you in a dug-out in Heaven.

Good luck and a quick recovery. I shall drink your health to-night."

I had little pain all this time, ~~only a great deal of~~ ^{but much} discomfort; ~~the~~ ^{chief} pain ~~was~~ ^{came} from my fingers which had turned septic because nobody had taken the trouble to dress it, ~~and~~ ^{and was throbbing. And} from the thigh where the sticky medical plaster, used to hold down the dressing, pulled up the hair painfully when it was taken off ~~the~~ ^{each time} wound ~~was~~ ^{was} dressed. My breath was very short still. I contrasted the pain and discomfort ~~with~~ ^{that of} favourably with the operation on my nose of two months back; ~~for this~~ ^{for this} I had ~~no~~ ^{won} sympathy at all ~~from anyone~~ because it was not an injury contracted in war. I was weak and petulant and muddled. The R.A.M.C. bugling outraged me. The Rob All My Comrades ^{I complained} had taken ~~all~~ ^{everything} I had except a few papers in my tunic-pocket and a ring which was too tight on my finger to be pulled off; and now they misblew the Last Post flat and windily and with the pauses in the wrong places, just to annoy me. I remember ^{that} I told an orderly to put the bugler under arrest and jump to it, or I'd report him to the senior medical officer.

Next to me was a Welsh boy named O.M.Roberts who had joined us only a few days before he was hit. He told me about High Wood; he had reached the edge of the wood when he was wounded in the groin. He had fallen into a shell-hole. Some time in the afternoon he had recovered consciousness and seen a German officer working round the edge of the wood, killing off the wounded with an automatic pistol. Some of our lightly wounded were apparently not behaving as "I lost heavily. It is not fair putting brave men like ours alongside that crowd. I also wish to thank you for your good work and bravery and only wish you could have been with them. I have read of bravery but I have never seen such magnificent and wonderful disregard for death as I saw that day. It was almost unbelievable. I once heard an old officer in the Royal Welch say that men would follow you to Hell, but these chaps would bring you back and put you in a dog-hole in Heaven."

Good luck and a quick recovery. I shall drink your health to-night.

before by the same person

I had little pain all this time, ~~discomfort~~ the pain from my fingers, which had turned septic because nobody had taken the trouble to dress it, ~~from the thigh~~ where the attack medical plaster used to hold down the dressing, pulled up the hair pain-fully when it was taken off, the wound ~~was~~ dressed.

My breath was very short still. I contacted the pain and discomfort ~~was~~ favourably with the operation on my nose of two months back. ~~I had~~ no sympathy at all from anyone, because it was not an injury contracted in war.

I was weak and petulant and muddled. The R.A.M.C. ~~was~~ working outraged me. The ~~Bob~~ Bob All My Comrades had taken ~~me~~ I had except a few papers in my tunic-pocket and a ring which was too tight on my finger to be pulled off; and now they mis-saw the last post flat and windily and with the panes in the wrong places, just to annoy me. I remember I told an Orderly to put the bugler under arrest and jump to it or I'd report him to the senior medical officer.

Next to me was a Welsh boy named O.M. Roberts, who had joined us only a few days before he was hit. He told me about High Wood; he had reached the edge of the wood when he was wounded in the groin. He had fallen into a shell-hole.

Some time in the afternoon he had recovered consciousness and seen a German officer working round the edge of the wood, killing off the wounded with an automatic pistol. Some of our lightly wounded were apparently not behaving as wounded men should; they ~~were~~ ^{were} sniping. The German worked nearer. ~~He~~ ^{He} saw Roberts move and came towards him, ~~he~~ fired and hit ~~him~~ ^{him in the arm}. Roberts was very weak and tugged at his Webley. He had great difficulty in getting it out of the holster. The German fired again and missed. Roberts rested the Webley against the lip of the shell-hole and tried to pull the trigger; he was not strong enough. The German was quite close now and was going to make certain of him this time. Roberts said that he just managed to pull the trigger with the fingers of both hands when the German was only about five yards away. The shot took the top of his head off. Roberts fainted.

The doctors had been anxiously watching my lung which was gradually filling with blood and pressing my heart too far away to the left of my body; the railway journey had restarted the haemorrhage. They marked the gradual progress of my heart with an indelible pencil on my skin and said that when it reached a certain point they would have to aspirate me. This sounded a serious operation, but it only consisted of putting a hollow needle into my lung through the back and drawing the blood off into a vacuum flask through it. I had a local anaesthetic; it hurt no more than a vaccination and I was reading the Gazette de Rouen as the blood hissed into the flask. It did ~~not~~ ^{not} look much, perhaps half a pint. That evening I heard a sudden burst of lovely singing in the courtyard where the ambulances pulled up. I recognized the quality of the voices. I said to Roberts, "The First Battalion have been in it again", and ~~asked~~ ^{asked a nurse} to verify it; I was right. It was their Delville Wood show, I think, but I am uncertain now of the date.

A day or two later I was ~~sent~~ ^{taken} back to England by hospital ship.

207

wounded men should; they ~~were~~ ~~amplified~~. The German worked nearer, he saw Roberts move and came towards him, he fired and hit Roberts was very weak and lagged at his Webley. He had great difficulty in getting it out of the holster. The German fired again and missed. Roberts reared the Webley against the lip of the shell-hole and tried to pull the trigger, he was not strong enough. The German was quite close now and was ~~about~~ ~~to~~ ~~make~~ ~~certain~~ ~~of~~ ~~him~~ ~~this~~ ~~time~~.

Roberts said that he just managed to pull the trigger with the fingers of both hands ~~and~~ ~~the~~ ~~German~~ ~~was~~ ~~about~~ ~~five~~ ~~yards~~ away. The shot took the top of his head off. Roberts fainted.
The doctors had been anxiously watching my lung which was gradually filling with blood and pressing my heart too far away to the left of my body; the railway journey had restarted the haemorrhage. They marked the gradual progress of my heart with an indelible pencil on my skin and said that when it reached a certain point they would have to operate me. This sounded a serious operation, but it only consisted of putting a hollow needle into my lung through the back and drawing the blood off into a vacuum flask through it. I had a local anaesthetic; it hurt no more than a vaccination and I was reading the Gazette de Rouen as the blood passed into the flask. It didn't look much, perhaps half a pint. That evening I heard a sudden burst of lovely singing in the courtyard where the ambulance pulled up. I recognised the quality of the voices. I said to Roberts, "The First Battalion have been in it again", and ~~to~~ ~~verify~~ it; I was right. It was their Deville Wood show, I think, but I am uncertain now of the date.

A day or two later I was sent back to England by hospital ship.

*wrote the most enthusiastic condolences to my parents
my headmaster, pp. 11-12.*

CHAPTER XIX.

I had sent my parents a wire that I would be arriving at Waterloo Station the next morning. The way from the hospital train to the waiting ambulances was roped off; as each stretcher case was lifted off the train a huge hysterical crowd surged up to the barrier and uttered a new roar. Flags were being waved. It seemed that the Somme battle was regarded at home as the beginning of the end of the war. As I idly looked at the crowd, one figure detached itself; it was my father, hopping about ~~about~~, waving an umbrella and cheering with the best of them. I was embarrassed, ~~but~~ but I was soon in the ambulance. ^{I was} on the way to Queen Alexandra's Hospital, Highgate, Sir Alfred Mond's big house lent for the duration of the war, and a really good place to be in; ~~Having~~ ^{Having} a private room to myself was the most unexpected luxury. ~~What~~ ^{What} I most disliked in the army was never being alone, forced to live and sleep with men whose company in many cases I would have run miles to avoid.

I was not long at Highgate; the lung healed up easily ^{and my finger was saved for me.} ~~enough~~ I heard here for the first time that I was supposed to be dead; the joke contributed ^{x greatly} ~~to~~ to my recovery. The people with whom I had been on the worst terms during my life wrote ^{x the most enthusiastic condolences to my parents; my house-master,} ~~for instance.~~ ^{for instance.)} ~~One of~~ ^{x came from} ~~the~~ ~~house-master.~~

I have kept a letter dated the 5th of August, 1916, from The Times Advertisement Department :-

Captain Robert Graves.

Dear Sir,

We have to acknowledge receipt of your letter with reference to the announcement contradicting the report of your death from wounds. Having regard, however, to the fact that we had previously published some biographical details we inserted your announcement in our issue of today (Saturday) under "Court Circular" without charge, and we have much pleasure in enclosing herewith cutting of same.

CHAPTER XIX.

I had sent my parents a wire that I would be arriving at Waterloo Station the next morning. The way from the hospital train to the waiting ambulances was roped off; as each stretcher case was lifted off the train a huge hysterical crowd surged up to the barrier and uttered a new roar. Flags were being waved. It seemed that the Battle of the Somme was regarded at home as the beginning of the end of the war. As I idly looked at the crowd, one figure detached itself; it was my father, hopping about waving an umbrella and cheering with the best of them. I was embarrassed, but was soon in the ambulance on the way to Queen Alexandra's Hospital. Sir Alfred Mond's big house lent for the duration of the war, and a really good place to be in. Having a private room to myself was the most unexpected luxury. I most disliked in the army was never being alone, forced to live and sleep with men whose company in many cases I would have run miles to avoid.

I was not long at Highgate; the lung healed up easily. I heard here for the first time that I was supposed to be dead; the joke contributed to my recovery. The people with whom I had been on the worst terms during my life wrote me the most interesting and amusing letters.

The Times Advertisement Department :-
I have kept a letter dated the 5th of August, 1916, from a and how to remove the
The Times Advertisement Department :-

Captain Robert Graves.

Dear Sir,

We have to acknowledge receipt of your letter with reference to the announcement concerning the report of your death from wounds. Having regard to the fact that we had previously published someographical details we inserted your announcement in our issue of today (Saturday) with "Gentle Circles" without charge, and we have much pleasure in enclosing herewith cutting of same.

also knowing word
in to last line.

(The cutting :-)

Captain Robert Graves, Royal Welch Fusiliers, officially reported died of wounds, wishes to inform his friends that he is recovering from his wounds at Queen Alexandra's Hospital, Highgate, N.

 fewer stars

Mrs. Lloyd George has left London for Criccieth.

 fewer stars

I never saw the ^{some letters written to me in France were returned to him as next of kin. They were surcharged:} ^{"Died of Wounds - present location uncertain - P. Down, post-corporal"} biographical details* supplied by my father; they might have been helpful to me here. The only inconvenience that my death caused me was that Cox's Bank stopped my pay and I had difficulty in persuading it to honour my cheques. I had a letter from Siegfried telling me that he was over-joyed to hear I was alive again. (I wondered whether he had been avenging me.) He was now back in England with suspected lung trouble. We agreed ~~that~~ when I was better to take our leave together at Harlech. Siegfried wrote that he was nine parts dead from the horror of the Somme fighting.

I was able to travel early in September. We met at Paddington. Siegfried bought a copy of the "Times" at the bookstall. As usual we first turned to the casualty-list; and found there the names of practically every officer in the First Battalion, either killed or wounded. Edmund Dadd was killed. His brother Julian, in Siegfried's company, wounded. (Shot through the throat as we learned later, only able to talk in a whisper, and for months utterly prostrated. ~~It had been at Ale Alley at Ginchy, on September the 3rd. A dud show; the battalion had been outflanked in a counter-attack.~~) News like this in England was far more upsetting than when one was in France. I was still very weak and could not help crying all the way up to Wales. Siegfried said bitterly, "Well, I expect the colonel got his C.B. at any rate." England was ~~the~~ ^{change to} the returned soldier. He could not understand the ~~the~~ ^{war-madness} that ran about everywhere looking for a pseudo-military outlet. Everyone talked a foreign language; it was newspaper language. ~~News like this in England was far more upsetting than when one was in France.~~ I found serious conversation with my parents all but impossible. A single typical memorial of this ~~the~~ time will be enough.

253-260

A MOTHER'S ANSWER TO

"A COMMON SOLDIER."

By A LITTLE MOTHER.

A MESSAGE TO THE PACIFISTS. A MESSAGE TO THE BEREAVED.
A MESSAGE TO THE TRENCHES.

Owing to the immense demand from home and from the trenches for this letter, which appeared in the "Morning Post," the Editor found it necessary to place it in the hands of London publishers to be re-printed in pamphlet form, seventy-five thousand copies of which were sold in less than a week direct from the Publishers.

Extract from a Letter from Her Majesty.

"The Queen was deeply touched at the "Little Mother's" beautiful letter, and her Majesty fully realises what her words must mean to our soldiers in the trenches and in hospitals."

To the Editor of the "Morning Post."

Sir, - As a mother of an only child - a son who was early and eager to do his duty - may I be permitted to reply to Tommy Atkins, whose letter appeared in your issue of the 9th inst.? Perhaps he will kindly convey to his friends in the trenches, not what the Government thinks, not what the Pacifists think, but what the mothers of the British race think of our fighting men. It is a voice which demands to be heard, seeing that we play the most important part in the history of the world, for it is we who "mother the men" who have to uphold the honour and traditions not only of our Empire but of the whole civilised world.

To the man who pathetically calls himself a "common soldier," may I say that we women, who demand to be heard, will tolerate no such cry as "Peace! Peace!" where there is no peace. The corn that will wave over land watered by the blood of our brave lads shall testify to the future that their blood was not spilt in vain. We need no marble monuments to remind us. We only need that force of character behind all motives to see this monstrous world tragedy brought to a victorious ending. The blood of the dead and the dying, the blood of the "common soldier" from his "slight wounds" will not cry to us in vain. They have all done their share, and we, as women, will do ours without murmuring and without complaint. Send the Pacifists to us and we shall very soon show them, and show the world, that in our homes at least there shall be no "sitting at home warm and cosy in the winter, cool and 'comfy' in the summer." There is only one temperature for the women of the British race, and that is white heat. With those who disgrace their sacred trust of motherhood we have nothing in common. Our ears are not deaf to the cry that is ever ascending from the battlefield from men of flesh and blood whose indomitable courage is borne to us, so to speak, on every blast of the wind. We women pass on the human ammunition of "only sons" to fill up the gaps, so that when the "common soldier" looks back before going "over the top" he may see the women of the British race on his heels, reliable, dependent, uncomplaining

The reinforcements of women are, therefore, behind the "common soldier." We gentle-nurtured, timid sex did not want the war. It is no pleasure to us to have our homes made desolate

2-2-26

A MOTHER'S ANSWER TO

"A COMMON SOLDIER"

BY A LITTLE MOTHER

A MESSAGE TO THE PACIFISTS. A MESSAGE TO THE TRENCHES.

Being in the trenches demand from home and from the trenches for this letter, which appeared in the "Morning Post". The letter found its way to the hands of London publishers to be re-printed in pamphlet form, seventy-five thousand copies of which were sold in less than a week direct from the publishers.

Extract from a letter from Mrs. [Name]

"The Queen was deeply touched at the 'Little Mother's' beautiful letter, and her Majesty fully realizes what her words mean to our soldiers in the trenches and in hospitals."

In the letter of the "Morning Post"

Sir - As a mother of an only child - a son who was early and eager to do his duty - may I be permitted to reply to Tommy Atkins, whose letter appeared in your issue of the 25th inst. Perhaps he will kindly convey to his friends in the trenches, not what the Government think, not what the pacifists think, but what the mothers of the British race think of our fighting men. It is a voice which demands to be heard, seeing that we play the most important part in the history of the world, for it is we who 'mother the men' who have to uphold the honor and traditions not only of our Empire but of the whole civilized world.

To the man who has bravely called himself a 'common soldier' may I say that we women, who demand to be heard, will tolerate no such cry as 'Peace! Peace!' where there is no peace. The corn that will wave over land watered by the blood of our brave men shall testify to the future that their blood was not split in vain. We need no marble monuments to remind us. We only need that force of character behind all motives to see this monstrous world steadily brought to a victorious ending. The blood of the dead and the dying, the blood of the 'common soldier' from his 'slight wounds' will not dry to an in vain. They have all done their share, and we, as women, will do ours without murmuring and without complaint. Send the pacifists to us and we shall very soon show them, and show the world, that in our homes at least there shall be no 'sitting at home warm and cosy in the winter, cool and 'comfy' in the summer.' There is only one temperature for the women of the British race, and that is white heat. With those who disgrace their sacred trust of motherhood we have nothing in common. Our ears are not deaf to the cry that is ever ascending from the battlefield from man of flesh and blood whose indomitable courage is borne to us, so to speak, on every blast of the wind. We women pass on the human ammunition of 'only sons' to fill up the gaps, so that when the 'common soldier' lacks back before going 'over the top' he may see the women of the British race on his heels, reliable, dependent, uncompromising.

The reinforcements of women are, therefore, behind the 'common soldier.' We gentle-natured, timid sex did not want the war. It is no pleasure to us to have our homes made desolate and the apple of our eye taken away. We would sooner our lovable, promising, rollicking boy stayed at school. We would have much preferred to have gone on in a light-hearted way with our amusements and our hobbies. But the bugle call came, and we have hung up the tennis racquet, we've fetched our laddie from school, we've put his cap away, and we have glanced lovingly over his last report which said "Excellent" - we've wrapped them all in a Union Jack and locked them up, to be taken out only after the war to be looked at. A "common soldier," perhaps, did not count on the women, but they have their part to play, and we have risen to our responsibility. We are proud of our men, and they in turn have to be proud of us. If the men fail, Tommy Atkins, the women won't.

254 261

Tommy Atkins to the front,
He has gone to bear the brunt.
Shall "stay-at-homes" do naught but snivel and but sigh?
No, while your eyes are filling
We are up and doing, willing To face the music with you - or to die!

Women are created for the purpose of giving life, and men to take it. Now we are giving it in a double sense. It's not likely we are going to fail Tommy. We shall not flinch one iota, but when the war is over he must not grudge us, when we hear the bugle call of "lights out," a brief, very brief, space of time to withdraw into our own secret chambers and share with Rachel the Silent, the lonely anguish of a bereft heart, and to look once more on the college cap, before we emerge stronger women to carry on the glorious work our men's memories have handed down to us for now and all eternity.

Yours, &c., A LITTLE MOTHER.

*In answer to numerous enquiries

EXTRACTS AND PRESS CRITICISMS.

"The widest possible circulation is of the utmost importance." The Morning Post.

"Deservedly attracting a great deal of attention, as expressing with rare eloquence and force the feelings with which the British wives and mothers have faced and are facing the supreme sacrifice." The Morning Post.

"Excites widespread interest." The Gentlewoman.

"A letter which has become celebrated." The Star.

"We would like to see it hung up in our wards." Hospital Blue.

"One of the grandest things ever written, for it combines a height of courage with a depth of tenderness which should be and is the stamp of all that is noblest and best in human nature." A Soldier in France.

"Florence Nightingale did great and grand things for the soldiers of her day, but no woman has done more than the "Little Mother" whose now famous letter in the Morning Post has spread like wild-fire from trench to trench. I hope to God it will be handed down in history, for nothing like it has ever made such an impression on our fighting men. I defy any man to feel weak-hearted after reading it My God! She makes us die happy." - "One who has Fought and Bled."

255 262

"Worthy of far more than a passing notice; it ought to be re-printed and sent out to every man at the front. It is a masterpiece and fills one with pride, noble, level-headed, and pathetic to a degree." - "Severely Wounded."

"I have lost my two dear boys, but since I was shown the "Little Mother's" beautiful letter a resignation too perfect to describe has calmed all my aching sorrow, and I would now gladly give my sons twice over." - A Bereaved Mother.

"The "Little Mother's" letter should reach every corner of the earth - a letter of the loftiest ideal, tempered with courage and the most sublime sacrifice." Percival H. Monkton.

"The exquisite letter by a "Little Mother" is making us feel prouder every day. We women desire to fan the flame which she has so superbly kindled in our hearts." A British Mother of an "Only" Son.

Uniform with this booklet -

THE CHAIN OF GREAT SACRIFICE.

also

"THE LAST KISS."

By The Same Author.

Terms:- In 100's at 3/6 post free, 50 at 2/- post free, or 10d. per doz. Single copies 1s. each. P.O. must accompany all orders to:-

PROPAGANDA,

c/o Post Office

Knowle, Bristol.

257 202

happy. - "One who has known and loved."

"Worthy of far more than a passing notice; it ought to be re-printed and sent out to every man as the front. It is a piece and fills one with pride, noble, level-headed, and practical to a degree." - "Sincerely yours."

"I have lost my two dear boys, but since I was shown the 'Little Mother's' beautiful letter a resignation too perfect to describe has claimed all my remaining strength and I would now gladly give my soul twice over." - A. [unclear]

"The 'Little Mother's' letter should read every corner of the earth a letter of the loftiest ideal, tempered with courage and the most sublime practicality." - Edward H. [unclear]

"The exquisite letter by 'Little Mother' is making us feel prouder every day. We women desire to be the flame which she has so superbly kindled in our hearts." - A British Mother of an 'Army Boy'.

This would be less

Little Mother's Booklet
"THE CHAIN OF GREAT SACRIFICES"

Also
"THE LAST KISS"
By The same Author.

Terms: - In 100's of 2/6 post free, 50 of 2/- post free, or 100/- per doz. Single copies 1/- each. P.O. order necessary all orders for: -
"PROPAGANDA,"
[unclear], Knowle, Bristol.

At Harlech Siegfried and I spent the time getting our poems in order; Siegfried was at work on his Old Huntsman.

We made a number of changes in each other's verses. ~~We were~~
I remember that I proposed amendments which he accepted in his obituary poem "To his Dear Boy" - written for me when he thought me dead.

~~both~~ We were beginning ~~also~~ to have doubts whether it ~~should~~ continue. It was said that Asquith in the autumn of 1915 had been offered peace-terms on the basis of status quo ante and that he had been willing to consider them; that ^{his colleagues had opposed him and that} this was the reason for the downfall of the Liberal Government and for the "Win-the-War" Coalition Government of Lloyd George that ~~was~~ superseded it. We both thought that the terms should have been accepted, though Siegfried was more vehement than I was on the subject. The view we had of the war was now non-political; we no longer saw it as a war between trade-rivals; its continuance seemed merely a sacrifice of the idealistic younger generation to the stupidity and self-protective alarm of the elder. ^(I made a facetious marginal note) on a poem I ^{wrote} ~~wrote~~ about this time called Goliath and David (in which the biblical legend was reversed and David was killed by Goliath)

~~War should be a sport for men above forty-five only, the Jesse's, not the David's. 'Well dear father, how proud I am of you serving your country as a very gallant gentleman prepared to make even the supreme sacrifice. I only wish I were your age: how willingly would I buckle on my armour and fight those unspeakable Philistines! As it is of course I can't be spared; I have to stay behind at the War Office and administrate for you lucky old men.' 'What sacrifices I have made,' David would sigh when the old boys had gone off with a draft to the Front singing Tipperary. 'There's father and my uncle Salmon and both my grandfathers, all on active service. I must put a card in the window about it.'~~

War should be a sport for men above forty-five only, the Jesse's, not the David's. 'Well dear father, how proud I am of you serving your country as a very gallant gentleman prepared to make even the supreme sacrifice. I only wish I were your age: how willingly would I buckle on my armour and fight those unspeakable Philistines! As it is of course I can't be spared; I have to stay behind at the War Office and administrate for you lucky old men.' 'What sacrifices I have made,' David would sigh when the old boys had gone off with a draft to the Front singing Tipperary. 'There's father and my uncle Salmon and both my grandfathers, all on active service. I must put a card in the window about it.'

we defined the war by making contrasted definitions of peace.

~~With Siegfried it was hunting and nature and pastoral scenes; with me it was chiefly children. When I was in France I used to spend~~

With Siegfried it was hunting and nature ^{+ music} and pastoral scenes; with me it was ^{chiefly} children. When I was in France I used to spend

205-203

At Harlech Siegfried and I spent the time getting out poems in order; Siegfried was at work on his Old Huntsman.

We made a number of changes in each other's verses. transcribed the original manuscript for the book - the last of the many poems
[redacted] We were beginning to have doubts whether it after he read you [redacted] It was said that Asquith in the autumn of 1915 had been offered peace-terms on the basis of status quo ante and that he had been willing to consider them; that this was the reason for the downfall of the Liberal Government and for the "Win-the-War" Coalition Government of Lloyd George that ~~was~~ superseded it. We both thought that the terms should have been accepted, though Siegfried was more vehement than I was on the subject. The view we had of the war was now non-political. We no longer saw it as a war between trade-rivals; its continuance seemed merely a sacrifice of the idealistic younger generation to the stupidity and self-protective alarm of the elders. the marginal comment on a poem I wrote about this time called Goliath and David (in which the biblical legend was reversed and David was killed by Goliath)

[redacted]

War should be a sport for men above forty-five only, the Jesse's, not the David's. 'Well dear father, how proud I am of you serving your country as a very gallant gentleman prepared to make even the supreme sacrifice. I only wish I were your age; how willingly would I buckle on my armour and fight those unspookable Philistines!
As it is of course I can't be spared; I have to stay behind at the War Office and administer for you lucky old men.' 'What sacrifice I have made,' David would sigh when the old boys had gone off with a draft to the Front singing Tipperary. 'There's father and my uncle Salmon and both my grandfathers, all on active service. I must put a card in the window about it.'

[redacted]

[redacted]

[redacted]

With Siegfried it was hunting and nature and pastoral scenes; with me it was children. When I was in France I used to spend much of my spare time playing with the French children in the villages ^{in which} I was billeted. I ^{put them} into my poems, ~~_____~~ and ^{my} childhood at Harlech. ~~_____~~ I called my book Fairies and Fusiliers. Siegfried stayed a few weeks. When he had gone I began the novel on which ~~_____~~ earlier war chapters are based, ~~_____~~ remained a rough draft.

-257- 264A

In September I went for a visit to Kent to the house of a First Battalion friend who had recently been wounded. His elder brother had been killed in the Dardanelles, and his mother kept his bedroom exactly as he had left it, with the sheets aired, his linen always freshly laundered, and flowers and cigarettes by his bed-side. She was religious and went about with a vague bright look on her face. The first night I spent there my friend and I sat up talking about the war until after twelve o'clock. His mother had gone to bed early after urging us not to get too tired. The talk excited me but I managed to fall asleep at about one o'clock. I was continually ^{awakened} by sudden rapping noises which at first I tried to disregard but ^{which} grew louder and louder ~~_____~~. They seemed to come from everywhere. I lay in a cold sweat. About three o'clock ^{I heard} a diabolic yell and a succession of laughing sobbing shrieks that sent me flying to the door. I collided in the passage with the mother who, to my surprise, was fully dressed. She said, "It's nothing. One of the maids has hysterics. I am so sorry you have been disturbed." So I went back to bed, but I could not sleep though the noises had stopped. In the morning I said to my friend, "I'm leaving this place. It's worse than France." He said, "I'm sorry. I should have told you. My mother has been reading Sir Oliver Lodge's Raymond or Life much of my spare time playing with the French children in the villages I was billeted. I [redacted] into my [redacted] childhood at Harlow. I called my book Warrior and Warrior. [redacted] stayed a few weeks. When he had gone I began the

Ref 207 A

In September I went for a visit to Kent to the house of a First Battalion friend who had recently been wounded. His elder brother had been killed in the Dardanelles, and his mother kept his bedroom exactly as he had left it, with the sheets aired, his linen always freshly laundered, and flowers and cigarettes by his bedside. She was religious and went about with a very bright look on her face. The first night I spent there my friend and I sat up talking about the war until after [redacted] check. His mother had gone to bed early after urging us not to get too tired. The talk excited me but I managed to fall asleep at about one o'clock. I was continually [redacted] by sudden tapping noises which at first I tried to disregard but grew louder and louder [redacted] They seemed to come from everywhere. I lay in a cold sweat. About three o'clock [redacted] a disjunctive yell and a succession of laughing sobbing shrieks that sent me flying to the door. I collided in the passage with the mother who, to my surprise, was fully dressed. She said, "It's nothing. One of the maids has hysterics. I am so sorry you have been disturbed." So I went back to bed, but I could not sleep though the noises had stopped. In the morning I said to my friend, "I'm leaving this place. It's worse than France." He said, "I'm sorry. I should have told you. My mother has been reading Sir Oliver Lodge's Raymond or Life after Death and she sits up half the night trying to get in touch with ~~him~~ ^{my brother}. It's pathetic because he was not at all the person she thinks he was. The idiotic messages that she gets through from him and believes often make me anxious for her sanity. Still, she seems happy. The rappings are most disturbing sometimes and the maids think that the place is haunted."

2646

In November Siegfried and I re-joined the battalion at Litherland and shared a hut together. We decided that it was no use making a protest against the war. Everyone was mad; we were hardly sane ourselves. ~~He~~ Siegfried said ^{that} we had to keep up the good reputation of the poets ^{as men of courage, he meant}. The best place for us was back in France away from the more shameful madness of home service. Our function there was not to kill Germans, though that might happen, but to make things easier for the men under our command. For them, the difference between ^{being under} ~~someone whom they~~ ^{could count on} ~~and~~ ^{someone who} protected them as much as ^{he} ~~they~~ could from the ^{grosser} indignities of the military system, and having to study the whims of any thoughtless petty tyrant in an officer's tunic, was all the difference in the world. By this time the ranks of both line-battalions were filled with men who had enlisted for patriotic reasons and the professional-soldier tradition was hard on them. ~~Siegfried~~ ^{That is a story of} ~~the~~ ^{for instance, on (I think)} ~~day before~~ ^(I think) the Fricourt attack, ~~and~~ ~~the~~ ~~attack~~ had been rehearsed over dummy-trenches in the back areas for a week ~~until~~ ^{in fact almost} until the whole performance was perfect, ~~stale~~ ~~Siegfried~~ was told to rehearse once more. Instead, he led his ^{platoon} into a wood and read to them ~~nothing~~ ^{just} ~~either~~ military or literary, ~~the~~ ~~London Mail~~. Though the London Mail was not in his line Siegfried thought that the men would enjoy the Things We Want To Know column.

could count on

244

after death and she sits up half the night trying to get in touch with ~~him~~ It's pathetic because he was not at all the person she thinks he was. The idiotic messages that she gets through from him and believes often make me anxious for her sanity. Still, she seems happy. The rappings are most disturbing sometimes and the maids think that the place is haunted."

Things We Want To Know column.
not in his line Siegfried thought that the men would enjoy the the London Mail: though the London Mail was them, nothing military or literary. Instead, he led his into a wood and read to Siegfried was told to rehearse for a week until the whole performance was perfect, attack had been rehearsed over dummy-trenches in the back the day before, the the day before the Siegfried. The professional-soldier tradition was hard on them. filled with men had enlisted for patriotic reasons and world. By this time the ranks of both line-battalions were tyrant in an officer's rank, was all the difference in the system and having to study the whims of any thoughtless petty much as could from the indignities of the military protected them as under our command. For them, the difference between though that might happen, but to make things easier for the men of home service. Our intention there was not to kill Germans, for us was back in France away from the more shameful madness

Officers of the Royal Welch were honorary members of a ^{neighbouring golf club} ~~club~~. Siegfried and I used to go there often. He played golf and I hit a ball alongside him. I had once played at Harlech as a junior member of the Royal St. David's but I had given it up before long because it was bad for my temper. I was afraid of taking it up again seriously, so now I limited myself to a single club. When I mis-hit it did not matter. I played the fool and purposely put Siegfried off his game; he was a serious golfer. It was the time of great food shortage; the submarines sank about every fourth ^{food-ship} ~~ship~~ food and there was a strict meat, butter and sugar ration. But the war did not seem to have reached Formby. The principal business men of Liverpool were members of the club and ~~they~~ ^{did not mean} to go short while there was any food at all coming in at the Docks. Siegfried and I went to ^{the club house} ~~the club~~ ^{for lunch on the day before Christmas} ~~for lunch~~; there was a cold buffet in the club dining-room ^{offering} ~~with~~ hams, barons of beef, jellied tongues, cold ^{and chicken} ~~roast~~ turkey ~~and~~; ^{large, meaty-faced} ~~a~~ waiter presided. Siegfried satirically asked him; "Is this all? There doesn't seem to be quite such a good spread as ⁱⁿ previous years." The waiter apologised, "No, sir, this isn't quite up to the usual mark, sir, but we are expecting a more satisfactory consignment of meat ~~on~~ on Boxing Day." The dining-room at the Club House was always full; the links were practically deserted.

The favourite rendezvous of the officers of the Mersey garrison was the Adelphi Hotel. ^{It had} ~~it had~~ a cocktail bar ~~and~~ and a swimming bath. The cocktail bar was generally crowded with Russian naval officers, always very drunk. One day I met a major of the King's Own Scottish Borderers there. I saluted him. He told me confidentially, taking me aside; "It's nice of you to salute me, my boy, but I must confess that I am not what I seem. I wear a crown on my sleeve and so does a company sergeant-major; but then he's not entitled to wear these three cuff-bands and the wavy border. Look at them, aren't they pretty? As I was saying, I'm not what I seem to be. I'm a sham. I've got a sergeant-major's stomach." I was quite accustomed to drunken senior officers, so I answered respectfully, "Really, major, and how did you come to get that?" He said, "You think I'm drunk. Well, I am if you like, but it's true about my stomach. You see I was in that Beaumont-Hamel show and I got shot in the guts. It hurt like hell, let me tell you. They got me down to the field-hospital. I was busy dying; there was a company sergeant-major in the hospital at the time and he had got it through the head, and he was busy dying too, and he did die. Well, as soon as the sergeant-major died they took out that long gut, whatever you call the thing, the thing that unwinds - they say it's as long as a cricket pitch - and they put it into me, grafted it on somehow. Wonderful chaps these medicos. They can put in spare parts as if one was a motor-car. Well, this sergeant-major seems to have been an abstemious man; the lining of the new gut is much better than my old one; so I'm celebrating it. I only wish I had his kidneys too."

An R.A.M.C. captain was sitting by. He broke into the conversation, "Yes, major, I know what a stomach^xwound's like. It's the worst of the lot. You were lucky to reach the field-ambulance alive^x, The best chance is to lie absolutely still. I got mine out between the lines ^{degn} banged a fellow. I flopped into a shell-hole. ~~My~~ stretcher-bearers wanted to carry me back but I wasn't having any. I kept everyone off with a revolver for forty-eight hours. That saved my life. I couldn't count on a spare gut waiting for me at the dressing station. My only chance was to lie still and let it heal, ~~_____~~."

In December I attended a medical board; they examined my wound and asked me how I was feeling ~~_____~~ whether I wanted ^{a few months} ~~_____~~ more home-service. I said, "No, ^{sure,} I should be much obliged if you would pass me fit for service overseas." In January I went out again.

I went back as an old soldier; my kit and baggage proved it. I had reduced the 'Christmas tree' that I first brought out to a pocket-torch with a fourteen-day battery in it, and a pair of insulated wire-cutters strong enough to cut German wire, (the ordinary British army-issue would only cut British wire). Instead of a haversack I had a pack like the ones the men carried, but lighter and waterproof. I had lost my revolver when I was wounded and had not bought another; rifle and bayonet could always be got from the battalion. (Not carrying rifle and bayonet made officers conspicuous in an attack; in most divisions now they carried them, and also wore trousers rolled down over their puttees like the men because the Germans had been taught to recognise them by their thin knees.) Instead of the heavy blankets that I had brought out before I now had an eiderdown sleeping-bag in an oiled-silk cover. I also had Shakespeare and a Bible, both printed on india-paper, a Catulus and a Lucretius in Latin, and two light-weight folding canvas arm-chairs, one as a present for Yates, the quartermaster, the other for myself. I was wearing a very thick whip-cord tunic with a neat patch over the second button and another between the shoulders; it was my only salvage from ^{the} ~~_____~~ last time out except the pair of ski-ing boots which I was wearing again, reasonably waterproof ^{— my breeches has been cut off me in hospital.}

There was a draft of ten young officers with me. As apart but waiting for me at the dressing station. My only chance was to lie still and let it heal.

200-207

In December I attended a medical board; they examined my wound and asked me how I was feeling. I wanted more home-service. I said, "No, I should be much obliged if you would pass me fit for service overseas." In January I went out again.

I went back as an old soldier; my kit and baggage proved it. I had reduced the Christmas tree that I first brought out to a pocket torch with a fourteen-day battery in it, and a pair of insulated wire-cutters strong enough to cut German wire (the ordinary British wire would only cut British wire). Instead of a haversack I had a pack like the ones the men carried, but lighter and waterproof.

I had lost my revolver when I was wounded and had not bought another; rifle and bayonet could always be got from the battalion. (Not carrying rifle and bayonet made officers conspicuous in an attack; in most divisions now they carried them, and also wore trousers rolled down over their puttees like the men because the Germans had been taught to recognize them by their thin knees.) Instead of the heavy blankets that I had brought out before I now had an eiderdown sleeping-bag in an oil-silk cover. I also had Shakespeares and a Bible, both printed on India-paper, a Gaculus and a Lactarius in Latin, and two light-weight folding canvas arm-chairs.

one as a present for Yates, the quartermaster, the other for myself. I was wearing a very thick whip-cord tunic with a neat patch over the second button and another between the shoulders; it was my only salvage from last time out except the pair of skiving boots which I was wearing again, reasonably waterproof. — my boots are here

Cut off one in hospital
There was a draft of ten young officers with me. As

Captain Charles
Mr. Edmonds notes in his book A Subaltern's War, young officers at this time were expected to be "roystering blades with wine and women." These ten did their best. Three of them got venereal disease at Rouen. In each case, I believe, it was the first time that they had been with women. They were strictly brought-up Welsh boys of the professional classes and knew nothing about prophylactics. One of them was sharing a hut with me. He came in very late and very drunk one night from the Drapeau Blanc, a well-known ^{Blue Lamp} brothel. ~~Some officers~~ woke me up and began telling me what a wonderful time he had had. He had never, ^{known before} he said, ~~known what a~~ ^{what a wonderful} ~~thing sex was.~~ ^{thing sex was.} I said irritably and in some disgust, "The Drapeau Blanc? Then I hope to God you washed yourself." He was very Welsh and on his dignity. "What do you mean, Captain Graves? I did wash my ha --ands." There were no restraints in France as in England; these boys had money to spend and knew that they had a good chance of being killed within a few weeks anyhow. They did not want to die virginal. So venereal hospitals at the Base were always crowded. (The troops took a lewd delight in exaggerating the proportion of army chaplains to combatant officers treated there.) The Drapeau Blanc saved the life of scores of them by incapacitating them ~~for~~ ^{for} future trench-service.

The instructors at the Bull Ring were full of bullet-and-bayonet enthusiasm, which they tried to pass on to the drafts. The drafts were now for the most part either forcibly enlisted men or wounded men returning, and at this dead season of the year it was difficult for anyone to feel enthusiastic on arrival in France. The training principle had recently been revised. Infantry Training, 1914 had laid it down politely that the soldier's ultimate aim was to put out of action or render ineffective the armed forces of the enemy. This

[Redacted] Remond notes in his book A Subaltern's War, young officers at this time were expected to be "revetering blades with wine and women." [Redacted] did their best. Three of them got venereal diseases at Rouen. In each case, I believe, it was the first time that they had been with women. They were strictly brought-up Welsh boys of the professional classes and knew nothing about prophylactics. One of them was sharing a hut with me. He came in very late and very drunk one night from the Dragon Blanc, a well-known French [Redacted] woke me up and began telling me what a wonderful time he had had. He had never, he said, [Redacted] ^{known} [Redacted] I said irritably and in some disgust, "The Dragon Blanc? Then I hope to God you washed yourself." He was very Welsh and on his dignity.
 "What do you mean, Captain Grimes? I did wash my hands."
 There were no restrictions in France as in England; these boys had money to spend and knew that they had a good chance of being killed within a few weeks anyhow. They did not want to die virginally. So venereal hospitals at the Base were always crowded. (The troops took a few delight in exaggerating the proportion of army chaplains to combatant officers treated there.) The Dragon Blanc saved the life of scores of them by inoculating them ~~with~~ ^{against} future French services.
 The instructors at the Ball Hill were full of bullet-and-bayonet enthusiasm which they tried to pass on to the drafts.
 The drafts were now for the most part either forcibly enlisted men or wounded men returning, and at this dead season of the year it was difficult for anyone to feel enthusiastic on arrival in France. The training principle had recently been revised. Infantry Training, 1914 had laid it down positively that the soldier's ultimate aim was to put out of action or render ineffective the armed forces of the enemy. This

-262-

(for a war of attrition) (directly) statement was now not considered ~~realistic~~ enough. Troops were taught instead that their duty was to HATE the Germans and KILL as many of them as possible. In bayonet-practice the men were ordered to make horrible grimaces and utter blood-curdling yells as they charged. The bayonet-fighting instructors' faces were permanently set in a ghastly grin. "Hurt him, now! In at his belly! Tear his guts out!" they would scream as the men charged the dummies. "Now that upper swing at his privates with the butt. Ruin his chances for life. No more little Fritzes!.. Naaaah! Anyone would think that you loved the bloody swine, patting and stroking 'em like that. BITE HIM, I SAY! STICK YOUR TEETH IN HIM AND WORRY HIM! EAT HIS HEART OUT!"

Once more I was glad to be sent up to the trenches.

-264- 271

as the one bright ^{moment} of the twenty-four hours. When this was denied them, their resistance weakened. ~~_____~~ to ~~_____~~ ^{I took the rations up} through Cléry, which had been a wattle and daub village of some hundreds of inhabitants. The highest part of it now standing was a short course of brick wall about three feet high; the rest was enormous overlapping shell-craters. A broken-down steam-roller by the road-side had the name of the village chalked on it as a guide to travellers. We often lost a horse or two at Cléry, which the Germans continued to shell from habit.

Our reserve billets for these Bouchavesnes trenches were at Suzanne. They were not really billets, but dug-outs and shelters. Suzanne ^{was also in ruins. The winter} ~~_____~~ was the hardest ~~_____~~ since 1894-5; the men played inter-company football matches on the river which was now frozen two feet thick. I remember a meal here in a shelter-billet; stew and tinned tomato on metal plates. Though the food came in hot from the kitchen next door, before we had finished it there was ice on the edge of the plate. In all this area there were no French civilians, no unshelled houses, no signs of cultivation. The only living creatures that I saw except soldiers and horses and mules were a few moor-hen and duck in the narrow unfrozen part of the river. There was a shortage of fodder for the horses, many of which were sick; the ration was down to three pounds a day, and they only had open standings. I have kept few records of this time but the memory of its misery survives.

Then I had bad tooth-ache and there was nothing for it but to take a horse and ride twenty miles to the nearest army dental-station. The dentist who attended me was under the weather like everyone else. He ^w could do nothing ^{at first} but grumble what a fool he had been to offer his services to his country at such a low salary. "When I think," he said, "of the terrible destruction to the nation's teeth that is being done by unqualified men at home and the huge fees that they are exacting for their wicked work it makes me boil with rage." There followed further complaints against the way he was treated and the unwillingness of the Royal Army Medical Corps to give dentists any promotion beyond lieutenant's rank. Later he began work on my tooth. "An abcess," he said, "No good tinkering about with this; must pull it out." So he yanked at it irritably and the tooth broke off. He tried again; there was very little purchase and it broke off again. He ~~damned~~ ^{damned} the ineffective ^{type of} forceps that the government supplied. After about half an hour he got the tooth out in sections. I rode home with lacerated gums.

-265- 272

I was appointed a member of a field-general court-martial on a sergeant in a bantam battalion charged with "shamefully casting away his arms in the presence of the enemy." I had heard about the case unofficially. He had been maddened by an intense bombardment, thrown down his rifle and run with the rest of his platoon. An army order, secret and confidential, had recently instructed me that in the case of men tried for their life on other charges sentence might be mitigated if conduct in the field had been exemplary; but cowardice was only punishable with death and no medical excuses could be accepted. I knew that there was nothing between sentencing the man to death and refusing to take part in the proceedings. If I chose the second course I would be court-martialled myself, and a reconstituted court would bring in the death verdict anyhow. ^{yet} I would not sentence a man to death for an offence which I might have committed myself in the same circumstances. I was in a dilemma. ^{evading} I met the situation by ~~evading~~. There was ~~only~~ one other officer in the battalion with the year's service as a captain, which entitled him to sit on a Field General Court-Martial. ~~I~~ I found him willing to take my place. He was hard-boiled & I glad of a trip to Amiens and I took over his duties for him.

273

Executions were frequent in France. My first direct experience of ~~the~~ official lying was when I was at the Base at Havre in May 1915 and read the back-files of army orders in the officers' mess at the rest-camp. There were something like twenty reports of men shot for cowardice or desertion; yet not a week later the responsible Minister in the House of Commons answering a question from a pacifist Member had denied that sentence of death for a military offence had been ~~carried out~~ in France on any member of His Majesty's forces.

The acting commanding-officer was sick and irritable; he felt the strain badly and ~~took~~ ^{took} a lot of whisky. One spell he was too sick to be in the trenches and came down to Frises, where he shared a dug-out with Yates the quartermaster and myself. I was sitting in my arm-chair reading the Bible and came on a ~~the~~ text, "The bed is too narrow to lie down therein and the coverlet too small to wrap myself therewith." "I say, James," I said, "that's pretty appropriate for ~~this place~~ ^{this place}." He raised himself up on an elbow, genuinely furious, "Look here, von Runicke," he said, "I am not a religious man. I've cracked a good many of the commandments since I've been in France; but while I am in command here I refuse to hear you or anyone bloody else blaspheme ~~Holy~~ ^{Wait} ~~the~~." I liked James a lot. I had met him first on the day I arrived at Wrexham to join the regiment. He was just back from Canada and hilariously throwing chairs about in the ~~ante~~ ante-room of the mess. He had been driving a plough through virgin soil, he told us, and reciting Kipling to the prairie-dogs. His favourite piece was (I may be misquoting) -

- 47 - 274

"Are ye there, are ye there, are ye there?
Four points on a ninety mile square.
With a helio winking like fun in the sun,
Are ye there, are ye there, are ye there?"

He had been with the Special Reserve a year or two before he emigrated. He cared for nobody, was most courageous, inclined to be sentimental, and probably saw longer service with the Second Battalion in the war than any officer except Yates.

A day or two later, because he was still sick and I was the senior officer in the battalion, I attended the Commanding Officers' Conference at brigade headquarters. Opposite our trenches was a German salient and the brigadier wanted to "bite it off," ^{as proof of the offensive spirit of his command.} Trench soldiers could never understand the Staff's desire to bite off an enemy salient. It was not a desirable thing to be exposed to fire from both flanks; if the Germans were in a salient our obvious duty was to keep them there as long as they could be persuaded to stay. We concluded that it was the passion for ^{straight lines} for which headquarters were well known and that it had no ^{strategic or} tactical significance. The attack had been twice proposed and twice cancelled because of the weather. This was towards the end of February in the thaw. I have a field message referring to it, dated the 21st :-

"Please	cancel	Form 4	of	my
AA 202	units	will	draw	from 19th	brigade	B.Echelon	the	following issue	of	rum	which	will be	issued	to	troops	taking part	in	the	forthcoming
operations	at	the	discretion	of
O.C.	units	2nd R.W.F.	7½	gallons.

-258- 275

Even this promise of special rum could not encourage the battalion. Everyone agreed that the attack was unnecessary, foolish and impossible. The company commanders assured me that to cross the three hundred yards of New Man's Land, which because of constant shelling and the thaw was a morass of mud more than knee-deep, would take even lightly-armed troops four or five minutes. It would be impossible for anyone to reach the German lines while there was a single section of Germans with rifles to defend them. The general, when I arrived, enquired in a fatherly way how old I was, and whether I was not proud to be attending a Commanding Officers' Conference at the age of twenty-one. I said that I ^{had not examined my feelings} but that I was an old enough soldier to realise the impossibility of the ^{proposed} attack. The colonel of the Cameronians, who were also to be engaged, took the same line. So the attack was called off finally. That night I went up with rations as usual; the battalion was much relieved to hear the decision.

We had been heavily shelled on the way up and while I was at battalion headquarters having a drink a message came to say that D. company limber had been hit by a shell. ^{As I went to inspect the damage I passed the} ~~limber~~ ^{from Five Bend, and a group of three or four men. He was} chaplain who had come up with me ^{gabbling the burial service} over ^{a dead man lying on the ground covered with a waterproof sheet.} ~~the~~ ^{It was a suicide-case. The misery of the} ^{the general desolation} weather, and the knowledge of the impending attack had been too much for him. This ^{was} ~~the~~ the last dead man I was to see in France, and like the first, a suicide.

I found that the limber, which contained petrol-tins of water for the company, had had a direct hit; there was no sign of the horses; ^{they} They were highly prized horses, having won a prize at a divisional horse show some months back for the best-matched pair of the division. So the transport sergeant and I sent the transport back and went looking for the horses in the dark. We stumbled ^{through} ~~over~~ miles of morass that night ^{but} ~~we~~ could ^{not} ~~find~~ find them ^{or} ~~get~~ any news of them.

- 257 - 276

~~It is considered that the horses were taken to the~~

Our transport animals were ~~the~~ ^{the best} ~~in~~ in France. Our transport men were famous horse-thieves and no less than eighteen of our stable had been stolen from other units at one time or another ^{for} ~~because~~ their good looks. There were even two which we had 'borrowed' from the Scots Greys. The horse I rode to the dentist came from the French police; its only fault was that it was the left-hand horse of the police squadron and so had a tendency to pull to the wrong side of the road. We had never lost a horse to any other battalion, so naturally Sergeant Meredith and I, who had started out with the rations at about four o'clock in the afternoon, kept on with the search until long after midnight. When we reached Frises at about three o'clock in the morning I was completely exhausted. I collapsed on my bunk.

The next day it was found that I had bronchitis and I went back in an ambulance to Rouen, once more to No. 2 Red Cross hospital. The major of the R.A.M.C. recognised me and said, "What on earth are you doing out in France, young man? If I find you in my hospital again with those lungs of yours I'll have you court-martialled."

The quartermaster wrote to me there that the horses had been found shortly after I had gone; they were unhurt except for grazes on their bellies and ^{were} ~~in~~ in the possession of the machine-gun company of the 4th Division; the machine-gunners were found disguising them with stain and trying to remove the regimental marks.

~~-270-~~ 277

At Rouen I was asked to say where in England I would like to go to hospital. I said, at random, "Oxford."

CHAPTER XXI.

So I was sent to Oxford to Somerville College, which, like the Examination Schools, had been converted into a hospital. It occurred to me now that I was probably through with the war, ^{for it could not last long now} I both liked and disliked the idea. I disliked being away from the regiment in France and I liked to think that I would probably be alive when the war ended. As soon as I was passed fit Siegfried had got boarded too and tried to follow me to the Second Battalion. He was disappointed to find me gone; I felt that I had somehow let him down. But he wrote that he was unspeakably relieved to know that I was back at Oxford.

I liked Oxford and wanted to stay there. I applied, on the strength of a chit from the Bull Ring commandant at Havre, for an instructional job in one of the Officer-Cadet Battalions quartered in the men's colleges. I was posted to the Wedham company of No. 4. Battalion. These battalions had not been formed long; they had grown out of instructional schools for young officers. The cadet-course was only three months (later increased to four), but it was a severe one, and particularly intended to train platoon commanders in the handling of the platoon as an independent unit. About two-thirds of the cadets were men recommended for commissions by battalions in France, the remainder were public-school boys from the officers' training corps. Much of the training was drill and musketry, but the important part was tactical exercises with limited objectives. We used the army text-book S.S.143 or "Instructions for the training of platoons for offensive action. 1917." perhaps the most important War Office publication issued during the war. The author is said to have been General Solly-Flood, who wrote it after a visit to a French army school. From 1916 on the largest unit possible to control in sustained action was the platoon, ~~the~~ Infantry training hitherto had ~~been~~ ^{treated the} ~~company~~ company as the chief tactical unit.

Though the quality of the officers had deteriorated from the regimental point of view, (in brief, few of the new officers were now gentlemen) their deficiency in manners was amply compensated for by their greater efficiency in action. The cadet-battalion system ~~was~~ saved the Army in France in the next two years from becoming a mere rabble. We failed about a sixth of the candidates for commissions; the failures were sometimes public-school boys without the necessary toughness, but usually men who had been recommended, from France, on compassionate grounds, - rather stupid platoon sergeants and machine-gun corporals who had been out too long and were thought to need a rest. Our final selection of the right men to be officers was made by watching them play games, principally rugger and soccer. The ones who played rough but not dirty and had quick reactions were the men we wanted. We ~~spend~~ ^t most of our spare time playing games ~~with them~~ ^{with them}. I had a platoon of New Zealanders, Canadians, South Africans, two men from the Fiji Island contingent, an English farm-labourer, a Welsh miner and two or three public-school boys. They were a fine lot and most of them were killed later on in the war. The New Zealanders went in for rowing; the record time ^{for} the river at Oxford was made by a New Zealand eight ~~that~~ ^{that} year. I found the work too much for my lungs, ~~for which~~ ^{for which} the climate of Oxford was unsuitable. I kept myself going for two months on a strychnine tonic and then collapsed again. I fainted and fell downstairs one evening in the dark, cutting my head open; I was taken back to Somerville. I had kept going as long as I could. ^PI had liked Wadham where I was a member of the senior commonroom and had access to the famous brown sherry of the college; it is especially mentioned in a Latin grace among the blessings vouchsafed to the fellows by their Creator. My commanding officer, Colonel Stenning, in better times University Professor of Hebrew, was a fellow of the college. The social system at Oxford was dislocated. The St. John's don, destined to be my moral tutor when I came up, was a corporal in the General Reserve; he wore grey uniform, drilled in the Parks and saluted me whenever we met. A college scout had a commission ^{and was instructing} in the other cadet battalion.

There were not, I suppose, more than a hundred and fifty undergraduates at Oxford at this time; ~~and~~ these were Rhodes scholars, Indians and ^{men who were} ~~the~~ unfit. I saw a good deal of Aldous Huxley, Wilfred Childe and Thomas Earp, who were running an undergraduates' literary paper of necessarily limited circulation called The Palatine Review to which I contributed. Earp had set himself the task of keeping the Oxford tradition alive through the dead years; he was president and sole member, he said, of some seventeen undergraduate social and literary societies. In 1919 he was still in residence and handed over the minute-books to the returning university. Most of the societies were then reformed.

I enjoyed being at Somerville. It was warm weather and the discipline of the hospital was easy. ^WWe used to lounge ^{in the grounds} about in our pyjamas and dressing-gowns, and ~~in~~ ~~the~~ ~~grounds~~ even walk out into St. Giles' and down the Cornmarket ~~in~~ ^{also} (in pyjamas and dressing-gowns) for a ^{morning} cup of coffee at the Cadena. And there was a V.A.D. probationer with whom I fell in love. I did not tell her so at the time. This was and fell downstairs one evening in the dark, cutting my head open; I was taken back to Somerville. I had kept going as long as I could. I had liked Wadham where I was a member of the senior commonroom and had access to the famous brown sherry of the college; it is especially mentioned in a Latin treatise among the pleasures vouchsafed to the fellows by their Creator.

My commanding officer, Colonel Stanning, in better times University Professor of Hebrew, was a fellow of the college.
The social system at Oxford was dislocated. The St. John's don, destined to be my moral tutor when I came up, was a corporal in the General Reserve; he wore grey uniform, drilled in the parks and saluted me whenever we met. A college scout had a commission in the other cadet battalion.
There were not I suppose, more than a hundred and fifty undergraduates at Oxford at this time; these were Rhodes scholars, Indians and ~~was~~ ^{was} ~~unit~~. I saw a good deal of Aldous Huxley, Wilfred Gidge and Thomas Harp, who were running an undergraduate literary paper of necessarily limited circulation called The Institute Review to which I contributed. Harp had set himself the task of keeping the Oxford tradition alive through the dead years; he was president and sole member, he said, of some seventeen undergraduate social and literary societies. In 1919 he was still in residence and handed over the minute-books to the returning university. Most of the societies were then reformed.
I enjoyed being at Somerville. It was warm weather and the discipline of the hospital was easy. We used to lounge about in our pyjamas and dressing-gowns, and ~~the~~ ^{the} ~~market~~ even walk out into St. Giles' and down the Cornmarket in pyjamas and dressing-gowns for a cup of coffee at the Cadens. And there was a V.A.D. probationer with whom I fell in love. I did not tell her so at the time. This was the first time that I had fallen in love with a woman and I had difficulty in adjusting myself to the experience. I used to meet her when I visited a friend in another ward, but we had little talk together. I wrote to her after leaving hospital. When I found that she was engaged to a subaltern in France I stopped writing; [redacted]

[redacted] I had seen what it felt like to be in France and have somebody else playing about with one's girl. Yet by the way she wrote reproving me for not writing she may well have been as fond of me as she was of him. I did not press the point. There was the end of it, almost before it started.

While I was with the ~~cadet~~ ^{cadet} Battalion I used to go out nearly every Sunday to tea ^{to} Garsington ~~where~~. Siegfried's friends, Philip and Lady Ottaline Morrell lived at the manor house. ^{Here} The Morrells were pacifists and it was here that I first heard that there was another side to the question of war guilt. Clive Bell was working on the manor-farm; [redacted]

^{am} had been permitted to do this as work of national importance instead of going into the army. ^{he was a conscientious objector} Aldous Huxley, Lytton Strachey, and ^{the Hon.} Bertrand Russell were frequent visitors there. Aldous was unfit, otherwise he would certainly have been in the army like Osbert and Sacheverell, Sitwell, Herbert Read, Siegfried, Wilfred Owen, myself and most other young writers of the time, none of whom now believed in the war. Bertrand Russell, who was beyond the age of ^{ability for} military service but an ardent pacifist (a rare combination), turned sharply on me one afternoon and said, "Tell me, if a company of men of your regiment were brought along to break a strike of munition makers and the munition makers refused to submit, would you order the men to fire?" I said, "Yes, if everything else failed. It would be no worse than shooting

282a

Germans, really." He was surprised and asked, "Would your men obey you?" "Of course they would," I said, "they loathe munition-makers and would be only too glad of a chance to shoot a few. They think that they're all skrim-shankers." "But they realise that the war's all wicked nonsense?" "Yes, as well as I do." He could not understand my attitude.

Lytton Strachey was unfit, but instead of allowing himself to be rejected by the doctors he preferred to appear before a military tribunal as a conscientious objector. ^{He followed the extraordinary impression that was caused by an air-raid, which he inflated during the proceedings as a protest against the hardness of the benches.} Asked by the Chairman the usual question, "I understand, Mr. Strachey, that you have a conscientious objection to war?" he ~~replied~~ replied (in his curious falsetto voice), "Oh, no, not at all, only to this war." Better than this was his ~~reply~~ reply to the Chairman's other stock question, which had never previously failed to embarrass the claimant—"Tell me, Mr. Strachey, what would you do if you saw a German soldier trying to ~~violate~~ ^{violate} your sister?" With an air of noble virtue:—"I would try to get between them."

In 1916 ~~I~~ I met more ^{well-known} ~~writers~~ writers than ever before or since. There were two unsuccessful meetings. George Moore had just written The Brook Kerith and my neurasthenic twitchings interrupted the calm easy flow of his conversational periods. He told me irritably not to fidget; in return I taunted him with having introduced cactus into the Holy Land some fifteen centuries before the discovery of America, its land of origin. At the Reform Club, H. G. Wells, who was Mr. Britling in those days, ~~and~~ ^{and} full of military optimism, ~~talked~~ ^{talked} without listening. He had just been taken for a

282 b
"Cook's Tour" to France and had been shown the usual sights that royalty, prominent men of letters and influential neutrals were shown by staff-conductors. He described his ~~experiences~~ experiences at ~~length~~ length and seemed unaware that I and the friend who was with me had also seen the sights. But I liked Arnold Bennett ^{kindly} for his ~~unpretentiousness~~ ^{unpretentiousness}. And I liked Augustine Birrell; I happened to correct him when he said that the Apocrypha was not read in the church-services; ~~and~~ ^{and} again when he said that Elijah ^u the Jebusite was one of Job's comforters. He tried to over-ride me in both points but I called for a Bible and proved ~~them~~ ^{them}. He said, glowering very kindly at me, "I will say to you what Thomas Carlyle once said to a young man who caught him out in a misquotation, 'Young man, you are heading straight for the pit of Hell!'"

By this ^{time} ~~the~~ the War Office had stopped the privilege that officers had enjoyed, after coming out of hospital, of going to their own homes for convalescence. It was found that many of them took no trouble to get well quickly and return to duty; they kept late nights, drank, and overtaxed their strength. So when I was somewhat recovered I was sent to a convalescent home for officers in the Isle of Wight. It was Osborne Palace; my bedroom had once been the royal night-nursery of King Edward VII and his brothers and sisters. This was the strawberry season and fine weather; the patients were able to take all Queen Victoria's favourite walks through the woods and along the quiet sea-shore, play billiards in the royal billiard-room, sing bawdy songs in the royal music-room, drink the Prince Consort's favourite Rhine wines among his Winterhalters, play golf-croquet and go down to Cowes when in need of adventure. We were made honorary members of the Royal Yacht Squadron. This is another of the caricature scenes of my life: sitting in a leather chair in the smoking-room of what had been and is now again the most exclusive club in the world, drinking gin and ginger and sweeping the Solent ~~with a~~ with a powerful telescope.

I made friends with the French Benedictine Fathers who lived near by; they had been driven from Sol^Sèmes in France by the anti-clerical laws of 1906 and had built themselves a new abbey at Quar^Fé. The abbey had a special commission from the Vatican to collect and edit ancient church-music.

or

~~the~~ the fathers at their plain-song ~~made~~ made us ^{for the moment} forget the war completely. ~~many of them~~ were

^{ex} ~~army-officers~~ ~~who had~~, I was told, turned to religion after ^{the ardours of their campaigns or after} disappointments in love. They talked a good deal about the war, which they saw as a dispensation of God for restoring France to Catholicism. They told me that the free-mason element in the French army had been discredited and that the present Supreme Command was predominantly Catholic, an augury, they said, of Allied victory. The Guest-master showed me the library of twenty thousand volumes, hundreds of them black-letter. The librarian was an old monk from Béthune and was interested to hear from me an accurate account of the damage to his quarter of the town. The Guest-master asked me whether there were any books ^{that} I would like to read in the library. He said that there were all ~~there~~ there - ~~history, botany, music, architecture,~~ history, botany, music, architecture, engineering, almost every other lay subject. I asked him whether there was a section ~~poetry~~ poetry. He smiled kindly and said, no, poetry was not regarded as improving.

The Father Superior asked me whether I was a bon catholique. I replied no, I did not belong to the true religion. To spare him ^a confession of agnosticism I added that my parents were Protestants. He said, "But if ours is the true religion why do you not become a catholic?" He asked the question in such a simple way that I felt ashamed. But I had to put him off somehow so I said, "Reverend Father, we have a proverb in England never to swap horses while crossing a stream. I am still in the war, you know." I offered, with myself, "Peut-être après la guerre." This was a joke; it was the stock-answer that the Pas de Calais girls were ordered by their priests to give to allied soldiers who asked for a "promenade, mademoiselle?" It was seldom given, I was told, except for the purpose of bargaining. All the same I half-cried of the Fathers ^{frustrated with wars and love-affairs} in their abbey on the hill. ^{I liked their} kind and serious ^{ness} clean whitewashed cells and the meals eaten in silence at the long oaken tables while a novice read the Lives of the Saints; the food, mostly cereals, vegetables and fruit, was the best I had tasted for years. (I was tired of ration beef, ration jam, ration bread and cheese.) At Quarr catholicism ^{ceased to be repulsive to me.}

Osborne was gloomy. Many of the ^{patients} there were neurasthenic and should have been in a special neurasthenic hospital. A.A. Milne was there ^{as} a subaltern in the ^{Royal} Warwickshire Regiment ^{and} in ^{the} least ^{humorous} vein. Vernon Bartlett, of the Hampshire Regiment, who had introduced me to the Quarr Fathers, decided with me that something ^{so we} must be started ^{to} ^{revive} founded the "Royal Albert Society"; its ^{aim was} interest in the life and times of the Prince Consort.

285

I was president and my regalia [redacted] consisted of a Scottish dirk, Hessian boots and a pair of side-whiskers. Official business was not allowed to proceed until the announcement had been duly made that the whiskers were on the table. Membership was open only to those who professed themselves students of the life and works of the Prince Consort, those who had been born in the province of Alberta in Canada, those who had resided for six months or upwards by the banks of the Albert Nyanza, those who held the Albert Medal for saving life, or those who were linked with the Prince Consort's memory in any other signal way. [redacted]

[redacted] The members were expected to report at each meeting collected [redacted] reminders that they had [redacted] from old palace-servants and Osborne cottagers, throwing light on the human side of the Consort's life. We had about fifteen members and ate strawberries. On one occasion about a dozen officers came in to join the Society; they professed to have the necessary qualifications. One said that he was the grandson of the man who had built the Albert Memorial, one had worked at the Albert Docks, and one actually did possess the Albert Medal for saving life; the others were mere students. They submitted quietly at first to the ceremonies and business, but it was soon apparent that they were not serious and had come to break up the society; they were in fact most of them drunk. They began giving indecent accounts of the private life of the Prince Consort, alleging that they could substantiate them [redacted] documentary evidence. Bartlett and I got worried; it was not that sort of society. So, as president, I rose and told an improved version of the [redacted] story which had won the 1914 All-England Inter-Regimental Competition at Aldershot for the worst story of the year. I linked it up with the Prince Consort by saying that he had been told it by John Brown, the Balmoral ^{ghillie} ~~ghillie~~, in whose pawky humour Queen Victoria used to find such delight, and that it had prevented him from sleeping for three days and nights and was a contributory cause of his premature death. The story had the intended effect; the interruptors threw up their hands in surrender and walked out. It struck me suddenly how far I had come since my first years at Charterhouse seven years back and what a pity it was that I had not used the same technique there.

286

On the beach one day Bartlett and I saw an old ship's fender; the knotted ropes at the top had frayed into something that looked like hair, so Bartlett said to me, "Poor fellow, I knew him well. He was in my platoon in the Hampshire Regiment and jumped overboard from the hospital ship." A little further along we found an old pair of trousers ^{half in the water} ~~and~~ and a coat and then some socks and a boot, So we dressed up Bartlett's old comrade, ^{draped} ~~and~~ sea-weed over him where ~~it~~ ^{necessary} ~~was~~, and walked on. Soon after we met a coast-guard and turned back with him. We said, "There's a dead man on the beach." He stopped a few yards off and said, holding his nose, "Pooh, don't he 'alf stink!" We turned again, leaving him with the dead, and the next day read in the Isle of Wight paper of a hoax that "certain convalescent officers at Osborne" had played on the coroner. Bartlett and I were nonsensical and changed the labels of all the pictures in the galleries. Anything to ^{make people laugh} ~~make people laugh~~

Siegfried used to write to me from France regularly. He had written in March:-

"My dear Robert,

You might pull yourself together and write to me. I am horribly low in spirits. The officers here are — you know what — and I haven't been made at all welcome. K — whom you know, went so far as to call me a bloody wart and also alluded to the bloody First Battalion. However, it isn't worth while having unpleasantness with such grossly stupid people. I am still trying to get transferred to the First Battalion. We're still resting until the end of the month, not more than two miles from our familiar village of last march (Montagne) surrounded by a sea of mountains rising in billows of mud slopes and muddy woods and aerodromes and lines of lorries and fine new railroads where I used to lallop around on the black mare of an afternoon watching the shells bursting away by the citadel. I am in C. Company with Radford as O.C. and a half-witted platoon awaiting my orders to do or die, and a beast of a stiff arm where old Dunn inoculated me to-day, sticking his needle in and saying, "Toughest skin of the lot, but you're a tough character I know." (Not so tough as he thinks.) I suppose my Old Huntsman will be published by the autumn. I am hoping we will get into some sort of show soon; it will be a relief after all these weeks of irritation and discomfort and disappointment. *I saw the Nation today. Wasn't it jolly for you & me to appear as a military just signing to a pacifist organ? You and me, the boys who mean to work together some day, did scandalize all the jolly old Gosses and Shakespears. **

287

After that he was in heavy fighting with the battalion, in the Hindenburg line. ~~_____~~ His platoon was ^{then} lent as support to the Cameronians, and when, in a counter-attack, the Cameronians were driven out of some trenches that they had won Siegfried with a bombing party of six men regained them. He was shot through the throat but continued bombing until he collapsed. The Cameronians rallied and returned and Siegfried's name was sent in for a Victoria Cross. The recommendation was refused, however, on the ground that the operations had not been successful; for the Cameronians later were driven out again by a bombing party under some German Siegfried.

He was back in England and very ill. He told me that often now when he went out he saw corpses lying about on the pavement. He had written to me in April: from hospital.

"It's bloody about the 2nd Battalion. I had a note from Yates: 4 officers killed and 7 wounded. (B--- got a "serious gun-shot wound in the shoulder," and is in No. 2, Red Cross Hospital, Rouen. Thank God he's not killed. I should have gone back in an aeroplane to kill Bosches if he'd been killed.) They were in the snow at Fontaine-les-Croiselles - the same place I was at - and were in the perfectly bloody battle there last Monday, when we apparently advanced about half-a-mile,

* I have not asked Siegfried's permission to print these letters (which he might not have given, from modesty) The truth is that he has cut me off. The occasion was my failure to observe the proper literary punctilios towards the late Sir Edmund Gosse C.B.

Siegfried used to write me from France regularly. He had written in March asking me to pull myself together and write to him because he was horribly low in spirits. He didn't seem to like the Second Battalion and complained that he had not been made at all welcome. A special reserve officer who had transferred to the Second Battalion and was acting captain had gone so far as to call him a bloody wart and allude to the bloody First Battalion. He had swallowed the insult and was trying to get transferred to the First Battalion. The Second was resting until the end of the month not more than two miles from Montagne, where we had been together in the previous March, surrounded by billows of mud slopes and muddy woods and aerodromes and fine new railroads where he used to lallop around on the black mare of an afternoon watching the shells bursting away by the citadel. He was in C. company with a half-witted platoon awaiting his orders to do or die and a beast of a stiff arm where Doctor Dunn had inoculated him, sticking his needle in and saying, "toughest skin of the lot, but you're a tough character I know." Siegfried said he was not so tough as Dunn thought. He was hoping that the battalion would get into some sort of show soon, it would be a relief after all these weeks of irritation and discomfort and disappointment. That was a feeling that one usually had in the Second Battalion. Siegfried said that he supposed his Old Huntsman would be published by the autumn. He had seen the Nation that week and commented how jolly it was for him and me to appear as a military duet singing to a pacifist organ. "You and me, the poets who mean to work together some day and scandalize the jolly old Gosses and Stracheys." Re-reading this letter now I am reminded that the occasion of the final end of our correspondence two years ago was that I had failed to observe the proper literary punctilios towards the late Sir Edmund Gosse C.B. I remember too how when the Old Huntsman appeared Sir Edmund had criticised an allegorical poem of Siegfried's -

*And many a slender sickly lord who'd filled
My soul long since with litanies of sin
Went home because he could not stand the din.*

This he considered as a libel on the British House of Lords. The peerage, he said, had proved itself splendidly heroic in the war.

Siegfried had his wish; he was in heavy fighting with the Battalion in the Hindenburg line soon after. His platoon was then lent as support to the Cameronians, and when, in a counter-attack, the Cameronians were driven out of some trenches that they had won Siegfried with a bombing party of six men regained them. He was shot through the throat but continued bombing until he collapsed. The Cameronians rallied and returned and Siegfried's name was sent in for a Victoria Cross. The recommendation was refused, however, on the ground that the operations had not been successful; for the Cameronians were later driven out again by a bombing party under some German Siegfried.

He was back in England and very ill. He told me that often now when he went out he saw corpses lying about on the pavement. He had written to me in April from hospital how bloody it was about the Second Battalion. Yates had sent him a note saying that four officers were killed and seven wounded in the show at Fontaine-les-Croiselles, the same place that he had been at and it had been a "perfectly bloody battle." But there had been an advance of about half a mile which seemed to him to be which was some consolation. It makes me mad to think of all the good men being slaughtered this summer, - and all for nothing. The bloody politicians and ditto Generals - with their cursed incompetent blundering and callous ideas will go on till they are tired of it, or have got all the Kudos they want.

288

w/ I wish I could do something to protest against it. If I shot the Premier or Douglas Haig - (or even Frankie Lloyd!!) they could only shut me up in a mad-house - (like Richard Dadd of glorious memory). If I refuse to go out again - as a protest - to commit suicide, they'll accuse me of being afraid of shells. Do you believe we shall be any better off by the end of this summer of carnage? We'll never break their line. So far, in April, we've lost more men than the Germans. The Canadians at Vimy lost appallingly. Yet the official communiques lied unblushingly about the casualties.... Damn all this war-talk.

Julian ~~Dadd~~ came to see me. He urged me not to go out again, like everyone else who comes here. But I know it's only a beautiful dream, and I'll have to go on till they kill me dead. But the thought of going back now is agony, just when I've got back into the light again - "O Life, O Sun!"

My wound is nearly healed, and I expect to go for three weeks in a convalescent home at the end of this week - anywhere - as long as I can be quiet and see no one: just watch trees dressing up in green - and feel the same myself. I'm beastly weak, and in a rotten state of nerves. The gramophone here is beyond description.

I am sending a copy of the Old Huntsman to Sir Douglas Haig - rather a joke - he can't stop me doing that anyhow."

In June he wrote:-

"I went to Garsington just before you left Oxford and had no idea you were still there in hospital. However perhaps it is as well that we didn't meet, neither of us being altogether at our best. It's as well for one of us to be in a normal frame of mind when we're together. You will want to know what I have been writing since I came home. Nothing much. Five poems have appeared in the Cambridge Magazine, none of them much good except as digs at the complacent and perfectly _____ people who think the war ought to go on indefinitely until everyone is killed except themselves. The pacifists urge me to produce something red-hot, à la Barbousse, but it can't be done. I've got other things in my head - not poems. The thought of all that happens in France (and the guns go on and on, I can hear them thudding now and here) nearly drives me dotty sometimes. I don't know whether I want to rush back and die with the First Battalion, or stay in England and curse everyone to hell for their stupidity. But the former method is only playing up to their own gallery ideas; and the latter is pretty hopeless. My name has gone in for Cadet work but I won't say I'm going to do it."

* ^{early nineteenth-century} The painter. He made a list of people who should be killed. The first on the list was his father. ^{He picked him up and} He carried him on his shoulders ^{publicly} ^{showing him in the Serpentine.} for nearly half-a-mile before.

289

Now at the end of July another letter came: it felt rather thin. I sat down to read it on the bench dedicated by Queen Victoria to John Brown ("a truer and more faithful heart never burned within human breast.") When I opened the envelope a newspaper-cutting fluttered out; it was marked in ink, "Bradford Pioneer, Friday July 27, 1917." I read the wrong side first:-

"THE C.O.'s MUST BE SET FREE.

By Philip Frankford.

The conscientious objector is a brave man. He will be remembered as one of the few noble actors in this world drama, when the impartial historian of the future sums up the history of this awful war.

The C.O. is putting down militarism. He is fighting for freedom and liberty. He is making a mighty onslaught upon despotism, and above all he is preparing the way for the final abolition of war.

But thanks to the lying, corrupt and dastardly capitalist press these facts are now known to the general public who have been taught to look upon the conscientious objectors as skunks, cowards and shirkers.

Lately a renewed persecution of C.O.'s has taken place. In spite of the promises of "truthful" cabinet ministers some C.O.'s have been sent to France, and there sentenced to death - a sentence afterwards transferred to one of "crucifixion", or five or ten years' hard labour. But even when allowed to remain in this country we have to chronicle the most scandalous treatment of these men - the salt of earth. Sainly individuals like Clifford Allen, Scott Duckers, and thousands of others, no less splendid enthusiasts in the cause of anti-militarism, are in prison for no other reason than because they refuse to take life; and because they will not throw away their manhood by becoming slaves to the military machine. These men MUST be FREED. The political "offenders" of Ireland....."

Then I turned over and read:-

FINISHED WITH THE WAR.

A Soldier's Declaration.

(This statement was made to his commanding officer by Second-Lieutenant S.L. Sassoon, Military Cross, recommended for D.S.O., 3rd Battalion Royal Welch Fusiliers, as explaining his grounds for refusing to serve further in the Army. He enlisted on August 3rd, 1914, showed distinguished valour in France, was badly wounded, and would have been kept on Home Service if he had stayed in the Army.)

I am making this statement as an act of wilful defiance of military authority, because I believe that the war is being deliberately prolonged by those who have the power to end it.

I am a soldier, convinced that I am acting on behalf of soldiers. I believe that this war, upon which I entered as a war of defence and liberation, has now become a war of aggression and conquest. I believe that the purposes for which I and my fellow-soldiers entered upon this war should have been so clearly stated as to have made it impossible to change them, and that, had this been done, the objects which actuated us would now be attainable by negotiation.

I have seen and endured the sufferings of the troops, and I can no longer be a party to prolong these sufferings for ends which I believe to be evil and unjust.

I am not protesting against the conduct of the war, but against the political errors and insincerities for which the fighting men are being sacrificed.

On behalf of those who are suffering now I make this protest against the deception which is being practised on them; also I believe that I may help to destroy the callous complacence with which the majority of those at home regard the continuance of agonies which they do not share, and which they have not sufficient imagination to realise.

S. Sassoon.

July, 1917.

This filled me with anxiety and unhappiness. I entirely agreed with Siegfried about the "political errors and insincerities"; I thought his action magnificently courageous. But there were more things to be considered than the strength of our case against the politicians. In the first place he was not in a proper physical condition to suffer the penalty which he was inviting, which was to be court-martialed, cashiered and imprisoned. I found myself most bitter with the pacifists who had encouraged him to make this gesture. I felt that not being soldiers they could not understand what it would cost Siegfried emotionally. It was wicked that he should attempt to face the consequences of his letter on top of his Quadrangle and Fontaine-les-Croiselles experiences. I knew too that as a gesture it was inadequate. Nobody would follow his example either in England or in Germany. The war would obviously go on and go on until one side or the other cracked.

I decided to intervene. I applied to appear before the medical board that was sitting next day, and I asked the board to pass me fit for Home Service. I was not fit and they knew it, but I asked it as a favour. I had to get out of Osborne and attend to things. Next I wrote to the Hon. Evan Morgan, whom I had canoed with at Oxford a month or two previously, he was private secretary to one of the Coalition Ministers. I asked him to do everything he could to prevent republication of or comment on the letter in the newspapers, and to arrange that a suitable answer should be given to Mr. Lees Smith, ^{then the leading} ~~the~~ pacifist M.P., when he brought up a question in the House about it. I explained to Morgan that I was on Siegfried's side really, but that he should not be allowed to become a martyr in his present physical condition. Next I wrote to the Third Battalion. I knew that the colonel ^{was a South Welshman,} was narrowly patriotic, had never been to France and could not possibly be expected to take a sympathetic view. But the senior major, an Irishman, was humane, so I wrote to him explaining the whole business, asking him to make the colonel see it in a reasonable light. I told him of Siegfried's recent experiences in France. I suggested that he should be medically boarded and given indefinite leave.

The next news I heard was from Siegfried, who wrote from the Exchange Hotel, Liverpool:-

"No doubt you are worrying about me. I came here on Friday, and walked into the Orderly Room feeling like nothing on earth, but probably looking fairly self-possessed. Found F.—— (the senior major) there. The C.O. was away on holiday.

Of course F. was prepared for the emergency - (and Tony Pryce had also been told). F. was nicer than anything you could imagine and made me feel an utter brute - but he has a kind heart.

They have consulted the General, who is consulting God - or someone like that. - Meanwhile I am staying at ^(Hotel) the Exchange - having sworn not to run away to the Caucasus.

No doubt I shall in time persuade them to be nasty about it. I don't think they realise that my performances will soon be very well known. I hate the whole thing more than ever - and more than ever I know that I'm right - and shall never repent of it. Things look better in Germany, but Lloyd George will probably say it is "a plot." These politicians seem incapable of behaving like human beings."

The General consulted, not God, but the War Office, and the War Office was persuaded not to press the matter as a disciplinary case, but to give Siegfried a medical board. Morgan had done his part of the work well.

The next task I set myself was to persuade Siegfried to take the medical board. ^{rejoined the battalion and} I met him at Liverpool. He looked very ill; he told me that he had just been down to the Formby Links and thrown his Military Cross into the sea. We discussed the whole political situation; I told him that he was right enough in theory; but that everyone was mad except ourselves and one or two others and that it was hopeless to offer rightness of theory to the insane. I said that the only possible course for us to take was to keep on going out to France till we got killed. I now expected myself to go back for the fourth time before long. I reminded him of the regiment; what did he think that the First and Second Battalions would think of him? How could they be expected to understand his point of view? They would say that he was ratting, that he had cold feet, and was letting the regiment down ^{by not acting like a gentleman}. How would Old Joe, even, understand it (and he was the most understanding man in the regiment)? To whom was his letter addressed? The army could ^{at least} ^(repeated) only understand it as cowardice or at the best as a lapse from good form. The civilians were more mad and hopeless than the army. He would not accept this view but I made it plain that his letter had not been given and would not be given the publicity he intended, ^{so} because he was ill, and knew it, he consented to appear before the medical board.

So far so good. The next thing was to rig the medical board. I applied for permission to give evidence as a friend of the patient. There were three doctors on the Board - a regular R.A.M.C. colonel and major, and a captain, who was obviously a "duration of the war" man. I had not been long in the room when I realised that the colonel was patriotic and unsympathetic, that the major was reasonable but ignorant, and that the captain was a nerve-specialist, right-minded, and my only hope. I had to go through the whole story again. I was most deferential to the colonel and major, but used the captain as an ally to break down their scruples. I had to appear in the rôle of a patriot distressed by the mental collapse of a brother-in-arms, a collapse directly due to his magnificent exploits in the trenches. I mentioned Siegfried's "hallucinations" in the matter of corpses in Piccadilly. The irony of having to argue to these mad old men that Siegfried was not sane. It was a betrayal of truth, but I was jesuitical. I was in nearly as bad a state of nerves as Siegfried myself and burst into tears three times in the course of my statement. Captain McDowell, ^a ^{whom} ~~_____~~ ^{well-known} morbid-psychologist (I learned later), played up well and the colonel was at last persuaded. As I went out he said to me, "Young man, you ought to be before this Board yourself." I was most anxious ^{that} when Siegfried ~~_____~~ went into the board room ^{after me} ~~_____~~ ^{should not} that he ~~_____~~ undo my work by appearing too sane. But McDowell ^a argued his seniors over.

Siegfried was sent to a convalescent home for neurasthenics at Craiglockhart, near Edinburgh. I was detailed as his escort. Siegfried and I both thought this a great joke, especially when I missed the train and he reported to "Dottyville", as he called it, without me. At Craiglockhart Siegfried was ^{in the care} ~~_____~~ of W.H.R. Rivers whom we now met for the first time, though we already knew of him ~~_____~~ ^{as} ~~_____~~ as a neurologist, ethnologist and psychologist. He was a Cambridge professor and had made a point of taking up a new department of (anthropological) ^{research} ~~_____~~ every few years and ^{incorporating} ~~_____~~ it in his comprehensive scheme. He died shortly after the war when he was on the point of contesting the London University parliamentary seat as an independent Labour candidate; intending to round off his scheme with a study of political psychology. He was busy at this time with morbid psychology. He had over a hundred neurasthenic cases ^{in his care} and diagnosed their condition largely through a study of their dream-life; his posthumous book Conflict and Dream is a record of this work at Craiglockhart. It was not the first time that I had heard of Rivers in this capacity. Dick had come under his observation after the police-court episode. Rivers had treated him and after a time pronounced him ^{sufficiently} ~~well~~ ^{and to enlist in the army} ~~well~~ in ~~the~~ ~~army~~. Siegfried and Rivers ^{soon} became ^{close} ~~friends~~ ^{friends}. Siegfried ^{was} ~~interested~~ ^{interested} in Rivers' ^{and Rivers in Siegfried's poems.} diagnostic methods ^L ~~and~~ ^B before I returned from Edinburgh I felt happier. ^{Siegfried} ~~he~~ began to write the terrifying sequence of poems that appeared next year as Counter-Attack. Another patient at the hospital was Wilfred Owen, who had had a bad time with the Manchester Regiment in France, and ^{further} ~~it~~ had preyed on his mind that he had been accused of cowardice by his ^{commanding officer.} ~~commanding officer~~. He was in a most nervous condition. It was meeting Siegfried here that set him writing his war-poems. He was a quiet (little) round-faced man.

294

295

CHAPTER XXII.

I went back to Liverpool. The President of the Medical Board had been right: I should not have been back on duty. The training at the camp was intensive and I was in command of a trained-men company and did not ^{allow myself} sufficient rest. I realised how bad my nerves were when one day marching through the streets of Litherland on a battalion route-march I saw three men wearing gas-masks standing by an open manhole in the road. They were bending over a dead man; his clothes were sodden and stinking and his face and hands were yellow. Waste chemicals of the munitions factory had got into the ^X sewage system and he had been gassed when he went down to inspect. The men in masks had ^{gone} down to get him up. The company did not pause in its march so I only had a glimpse of the group; but it was so like France that I all but fainted. The band-music saved me.

I was detailed as a member of a court-martial which sat in the camp. The accused was a civilian alleged to have enlisted under the Derby Scheme, but not to have presented himself when his class was called to the colours. He was ^{a X} rabbit ^{looking}, a nasty little man. I tried to ^{feel sympathetic} but ^{but} found it difficult, even when he proved that he had never enlisted. His solicitor handed us a letter from a corporal serving in France who explained that he had, while on leave, enlisted in the rabbit's name because he had heard that the rabbit had been rabbiting with his wife. This rabbiting the rabbit denied; ^{but} he showed that the colour of the eyes recorded on the enlistment-form ^{was} blue while his own were brown, so it seemed that the story was true so far. But a further question arose, why had he not enlisted, under the Military Service Act, if he was a fit man. He said that he was "starred", having ^{done} [redacted] responsible work in a munitions factory for the necessary length of time before the Military Service ^{Act} [redacted] had become law. However we had police evidence on the table to show that his protection certificates were forged, that he had not been working on munitions ^{worked before} [redacted] the Military Service Act [redacted] and that therefore he ^{was in the class of those} [redacted] "deemed to have enlisted" and so a deserter in any case. There was nothing for it but to sentence him for the prescribed two years imprisonment. He broke down and squealed rabbit-fashion and said that he had conscientious objections against war. ^{It made me feel contemptible as part of the story.} [redacted]

^{Large} [redacted] drafts were now constantly being sent off to the 1st, 2nd, 9th and 10th Battalions in France and to the 8th Battalion in Mesopotamia. There were few absentees among the men warned for ^{the drafts.} [redacted] But it was noticeable that they were always more cheerful about going in the spring and summer when there was heavy fighting on than in the winter months when things were quiet. (The regiment kept up its spirit even in the last year of the war. Attwater, [redacted] [redacted] told me that big drafts sent off ⁱⁿ ~~at~~ the critical weeks ^{of} [redacted] the spring of 1918, when the Germans had broken through the 5th Army went down to the station singing and cheering ^{enthusiastically} [redacted]. He said that they might have been the reservists that he and I had seen assembling at Wrexham on August 12th, 1914, to rejoin the Second Battalion just before it sailed for France.) The Colonel always made the same speech to the draft. The day that I rejoined the Battalion from the Isle of Wight I went via Liverpool Exchange Station and the electric railway to Litherland. Litherland station was crowded with troops. I heard a ^{familiar} [redacted] voice making a ^{familiar} [redacted] speech; it was the colonel bidding God Speed to a small draft of men who were rejoining the First Battalion. "..... going cheerfully like British soldiers to fight the common foe some of you perhaps may fall Upholding the magnificent traditions of the Royal Welch Fusiliers...." The draft cheered vigorously; rather too vigorously, I told myself. When he had finished I went over and greeted a few old friends, 79 Davies, 33 Williams, and the Davies who was nick-named "Dym Bacon," which was Welsh for "there isn't any bacon." (He had won that nick-name in his recruit days. ^{so he} complained about his first morning's breakfast, He was the son of a Welsh farmer and accustomed to good food. ^{ing} shouted out to the Orderly Sergeant: "Do you call this a bloody breakfast, man? Dym bacon, dym sausages, dym herrings, dym bloody anything. Nothing but bloody bread and jaaam.") There was another well-remembered First Battalion man - D.C.M. and rosette, Médaille Militaire, military medal, no stripe. "Lost them again, sergeant?" I asked. He grinned, "Easy come, easy go, sir." Then the train came in and I put out my hand with "Good luck!" "You'll excuse us, sir," he said. The draft shouted with laughter and I saw why my hand had not been wrung and also why the cheers had been so ironically vigorous. They were all in handcuffs. They had been detailed, a fortnight before, for a draft to Mesopotamia; but they wanted to go back to the First Battalion, so they overstayed their leave. The colonel, not understanding, put them into the guard-room to make sure of them for the next draft. So they were going back now in handcuffs under an escort of military police to the battalion of their choice. The colonel, as I have already said, had seen no active service himself, but the men bore him no ill-will for the handcuffs. He was a good-hearted man and took a personal interest in the camp kitchens, had built a cinema-hut within the camp, been reasonably mild in orderly-room, and done his best not to drive returned soldiers too hard.

I decided to leave Litherland somehow. I knew what the winter would be like with the mist coming up from the Mersey and hanging about the camp full of T.N.T. fumes. When I was there the winter before I used to sit in my hut and cough and cough until I was sick. The fumes tarnished all buttons and made our eyes smart. I considered going back to France but I knew that this was absurd as yet. Since Loos the fear of gas had become an obsession; in any unusual smell that I met I smelt gas - even a sudden strong smell of flowers in a garden was enough to set me trembling. And I knew that the noise of heavy shelling would be too much for me now; the noise of a motor-tyre exploding behind me would send me flat on my face or running for cover. So I decided to go to Palestine, where gas was not known and shell-fire was said to be inconsiderable by comparison with France. At my next Medical Board I asked to be passed in the category B.2. This meant "fit for garrison-service at home." I reckoned on being sent to the Third Garrison Battalion of the regiment, now under canvas at Oswestry in Wales. From there, when I felt a bit better, I would get myself passed B.1. which meant "fit for garrison service abroad," and would in due course go to a garrison battalion of the regiment in Egypt. Once there it would be easy to get passed A.1. and join the 24th or 25th (new-army) Battalion in Palestine.

So presently I was sent to Oswestry. A good colonel, but the material at his disposal was discouraging. The men were mostly compulsory enlistments and the officers, with few exceptions, useless. The first task I was given was to superintend the entraining of battalion stores and transport; ^{We were} moving to Kinmel Park Camp, near Rhyl. I was given

Sieffried wrote from Craiglockhart in August:
What do you think of the latest push? How splendid this attention is! As Lord Grease says: "We are not the least depressed."
I matched this with a remark of Lord Gaspar's: "The necessary supply of heroes must be maintained at all costs."

a company of one hundred and fifty men and allowed six hours for the job. I chose fifty of the stronger men and three or four N.C.O's. who looked capable and sent the rest away to play football. By organizing the job in the way that I had learnt in the First Battalion I got these fifty men to load up the train two hours before the scheduled time. The colonel congratulated me. At Rhyl he gave me the job of giving further instruction to the sixty or so young officers who had been sent to him from the cadet-battalions. Few officers in the battalion had seen any active service. [redacted] was [redacted] Howell Davies (now literary editor of the Star) who had ^{had} a bullet through his head and was in as nervous a condition as myself. We became friends and discussed the war and poetry late at night in the hut; we used to argue furiously, ^{shouting each other down.} [redacted] s.

It was at this point that I remembered Nancy Nicholson. I had first met her at Harlech, where the Nicholsons had a house, when I was on leave in April 1916 after the operation ^{on} my nose. She was sixteen then, on holiday from school. I had made friends with her brother, Ben, [redacted] the painter, whose asthma had kept him out of the army. When I went back to France in 1917 I had gone to say good-bye to Ben and the rest of the family on the way to Waterloo station and the last person to say good-bye to me that time was Nancy. I remembered her standing in the doorway in her black velvet dress. [redacted] ^{and} as sensible about the war as anybody at home could be. She was ignorant, ^{but independent-minded} [redacted], good-natured, and hard. In the summer of 1917 (shortly after the episode with the Somerville nurse) I had seen her again and we had gone together to a Revue, the first Revue I had been to in my life. It was Cheep; Lee White was in it, singing of Black Eyed Susans and how "Girls Must All Be Farmer's Boys, Off with Skirts, Wear Corduroys," and Nancy had told me that she was now on the land herself. She showed me her paintings, illustrations to Stevenson's Child's Garden of Verses; my ^{child} sentiment and hers - she had a happy childhood to look back on - answered each other, I liked all her family, particularly her mother, Mabel Nicholson, ^{now dead,} the painter, a beautiful wayward Scotch-melancholy person. ~~_____~~ William Nicholson, again 'the painter', ~~_____~~ is still ~~_____~~ among my friends. Tony, a brother, just older than Nancy, was a gunner, waiting to go to France.

I began a correspondence with Nancy about some children's rhymes of mine which she was going to illustrate. Then I found that I was in love with her and on my next leave, in October 1917, I visited her at the farm where she was working, at Hilton in Huntingdonshire. I helped her to put mangolds through a slicer. She was alone, except for her black poodle, among farmers, farm labourers and wounded soldiers who had been put on land-service. I was alone too in my Garrison Battalion. Our letters became more intimate after this. She warned me that she was a feminist and that I had to be very careful what I said about women; the attitude of the Huntingdon farmers to their wives and daughters kept her in a continual state of anger, she said.

I had been passed B.I. now, but orders ^{came} ~~_____~~ for me to proceed to Gibraltar. This was a disarrangement of my plans. Gibraltar was a dead-end; it would be as difficult to get from there to Palestine as it would be from England. A friend in the War Office undertook to cancel the order for me ^x until ^a ~~_____~~ vacancy ^{could be found} in the battalion in Egypt. At Rhyl I was enjoying the first independent command I had yet had in the army. ^{I got it through} ~~_____~~ a scare of an invasion of the north-east coast, to follow a sortie of the German Fleet. A number of battalions ^{were} ~~_____~~ sent across England for its defence.

All fit men of the Third Garrison Battalion ~~by~~^{were} ordered ^{to move} at twenty-four hours' notice to York. (There was a slight error, however, in the Morse message from War Office to Western Command. Instead of ^{dash-}dot-dash-dash they sent dash-dot-dash-dot so the Battalion was sent to Cork instead. Yet it was not recalled, being needed as much in Cork as in York; Ireland was in great unrest since the Easter rising in 1916 and Irish troops at the Depôts were giving away their rifles to Sinn Feiners.)

The colonel ~~by~~ told me that I was the only officer he could trust to look after the remainder of the battalion, thirty young officers and four or five hundred men engaged in camp-duties. He ~~by~~^{left} me a competent adjutant and three officers' chargers to ride. He had also asked me to keep an eye on his children whom he had to leave behind until a house was found at Cork for them; I used to play about a good deal with them. There was also a draft of two hundred trained men under orders for Gibraltar.

I got the draft off all right and the inspecting general was so pleased with the soldier-like appearance that the adjutant and I had given them that he sent them all to the camp-cinema at his own expense. This gave me a good mark with the colonel in Ireland. The climax of my good services was when I checked an attempt on the part of the Camp Quarter-master to make the battalion responsible for the loss of five hundred blankets. It happened like this. Suddenly one night I had three thousand three hundred leavemen from France thrown under my command; they were Irishmen, from every regiment in the army, and had been held up at Holyhead on the way ~~by~~^{Rome} by the presence of submarines in the Irish sea. They were rowdy and insubordinate and for the four days that they were with me I had little rest. The five hundred missing blankets were some of the six thousand six hundred that had been issued to them, and had probably been sold in Rhyl to pay for cigarettes and beer. I was able to prove at the Court of Inquiry that the men, though attached to the battalion for purposes of discipline had been issued with blankets direct from the Camp Quartermaster's Stores before coming to ~~it~~. The loss of the blankets might be presumed to have taken place between the time of issue and the time that the men arrived in ^{the} battalion lines. I had given no receipt to the Camp-Quartermaster for the blankets. The Court of Inquiry was held in the Camp Quartermaster's private office; but I insisted that he should leave the room while evidence was being taken, because it was now no longer his private office but a Court of Inquiry. He had to go out and his ignorance of my line of defence saved the case. This success, and the evidence ^{that} I was able to give the Colonel of presents accepted by the Battalion Mess-President when at Rhyl from wholesale caterers (the mess-president had tried to make me pay my mess-bill twice over and this was my retaliation) so pleased the colonel that he recommended me for the Russian Order of St. Anne, with crossed swords, of the Third Class. So, after all, I would not have left the army undecorated but for the October Revolution which cancelled the award-list.

I saw Nancy again in December when I went to London and we decided to get married at once. We attached no importance to the ceremony. Nancy said she did not want to disappoint her father who liked weddings and things. ~~_____~~

~~_____~~

I was still expecting orders for Egypt and intending to go on to Palestine. Nancy's mother said that she would permit the marriage on one condition ~~_____~~ that I should go to a London specialist to see whether I was fit for eventual service in Palestine. I went to Sir James Fowler. He told me that my lungs were not so bad, though I had bronchial adhesions and my wounded lung had only a third of its proper expansion; but that my general nervous condition made it folly for me to think of active service in any theatre of war.

~~_____~~ ^{who} had visited me at Rouen when I was wounded.

Nancy and I were married in January 1918 in St. James' Church, Piccadilly. She was just eighteen and I was twenty-two. George Mallory was the best man. Nancy had read the marriage-service for the first time that morning and had been horrified by it. She all but refused to go through the ceremony at all, though I had arranged for it to be modified ^{and reduced} to the ~~_____~~ ^{shortest} possible ^{form} ~~_____~~ ^{form}. Another caricature scene to look back on: ~~_____~~ myself striding up the red carpet wearing field boots, spurs and sword; Nancy ^x meeting me in a blue-check silk wedding dress ~~_____~~ ^x, utterly furious; packed benches on either side of the church full of relatives; aunts using handkerchiefs; the choir boys out of tune; Nancy savagely muttering the responses, myself shouting them out in a parade-ground voice. Then ~~_____~~ the reception. At this stage of the war sugar was practically unobtainable; the wedding cake was in three tiers, but all the sugar icing was plaster. The Nicholsons had saved up their sugar and butter cards for a month ^x to make the cake taste anything like a cake at all. When the plaster case was lifted off there was a sigh of disappointment from the guests. A dozen of champagne had been got in. Champagne was another scarcity and there was a rush towards the table. Nancy said, "Well, I'm going to get something out of this wedding at any rate," and grabbed a bottle. After three or four glasses she went off and changed back into her land-girl's costume of breeches and smock. My mother, who had been thoroughly enjoying the ^{proceedings} [redacted] caught hold of E.V. Lucas who was standing next to her and exclaimed, "Oh dear, I wish she had not done that." The embarrassments of our wedding night were somewhat eased by an air-raid; bombs were dropping not far off and the hotel was in an uproar.

A week later she returned to her farm and I to my soldiers. It was an idle life now. I had no men on parade; they were all employed on camp-duties. And I had found a lieutenant with enough experience to attend to the further instruction of the young officers. My orderly-room took about ten minutes a day; crime was rare, and the few documents to be signed the adjutant always had ready and in order [redacted]. I was free to ride my three chargers over the countryside for the rest of the day. I used to visit the ^{present} Archbishop of Wales frequently at his palace at St. Asaph; his son had been killed in the First Battalion. We found that we had in common a taste for the curious. I have kept a postcard from him which runs as follows :-

The Palace,
St. Asaph.

"Hippophagist banquet held at Langham's Hotel [redacted] 1868."

(February)

A.G. [redacted] A. Asaph

([redacted] I met numbers of bishops during the war, but [redacted] none since except the Bishop of Oxford, in a railway carriage [redacted] ^{in 1917} ^{who was discussing} the beauties of Richardson. And the Bishop of Liverpool at Harlech, in 1923: I was making tea on the sea-shore when he came out from the sea in great pain, having been stung in the thigh by a jelly-fish. He gladly accepted a cup of tea, tut-tutting miserably to himself that he had been under the impression that jelly-fish only stung in foreign parts. As a record of the occasion he gave me a silver pencil which he had found in the sandhills while undressing.)

I grew tired of this idleness and arranged to be transferred to the 16th officer Cadet Battalion in another part of the same camp. It was the same sort of work that I had done at Oxford and I was there from February 1918 until the Armistice in November. Rhyl was much healthier than Oxford and I found that I could play games without ^{danger of} another breakdown. A job was found for Nancy at a market-gardener's near the camp, so she came up to live with me. A month or two later she found that she was having a baby and had to stop land-work; she went back to her drawing.

None of my friends had liked the idea of my marriage, particularly to anyone as young as Nancy; one of them, Robbie Ross, Wilde's literary executor, whom I had met through Siegfried and who had been very good to me, had gone so far as to try to discourage me by hinting that there was negro blood in the Nicholson family, that it was possible that one of Nancy's and my children might revert to coal-black. Siegfried found it difficult to accustom himself to the idea of Nancy, ^{whom he had not met} but he wrote still. After a few months at Craiglockhart, though he in no way renounced his pacifist views, he decided that the only possible thing to do was, after all, to go back to France. He had written to me in the previous October:-

305

"I am so glad you like Owen's poem. I will tell him to send you on any decent stuff he does. His work is very unequal and you can help him a great deal.

Seeing you again has made me more restless than ever. My position here is nearly unbearable, and the feeling of isolation makes me feel rotten. I had a long letter from Old Joe to-day. They had just got back to rest from Polygon Wood and he says the conditions and general situation are more bloody than anything he has yet seen. Three miles of morasses, shell holes, and dead men and horses through which to get the rations up. I should like the people who write leading articles for the Morning Post, (about victory) to read his letter.

I have told Rivers that I will go back to France if they will send me (making it quite clear that my views are exactly the same as in July - only more so). They will have to give me a written guarantee that I shall be sent back at once. I don't quite understand how it is that Rivers can do nothing but pass me for General Service - as he says - because I am in the same condition as I was three months ago, and if I am fit for General Service now, I was fit then. He says I've got a very strong "anti-war complex" whatever that means.

However we shall see what they say. Personally I would rather be anywhere than here. It's too bloody to think of poor old Joe lying out all night in shell-holes and being shelled (several of the ration party were killed) but, as he says - "the Battalion got their rations" - what a man he is. O Robert, what ever will happen to end the war? It's all very well for you to talk about "good form" and "acting like a gentleman" - * To me that's a very estimable form of suicidal stupidity and credulity. You admit that the people who sacrifice the troops are callous b---s, and the same thing is happening in all countries - (except some of Russia) - If you had real courage you wouldn't acquiesce as you do."

I have forgotten how ^{it} this was worked and whether I had a hand in it, but he was sent to Palestine this time. He seemed to like it there, and I was distressed in April to have a letter from him from "Somewhere in Ephraim" that the division was moving to France:-

"I shall be sorry to be in trenches going over the top to take Morlancourt or Méaulte. Isn't it bloody? Seeing that we recaptured Morlancourt brought it home to me somehow. I expect the First and Second battalions have about ceased to exist by now for the nth time."

* See page 292

I heard again from him at the end of May from France. He quoted Deuhamel. "It was written that you should suffer without purpose and without hope, but I will not let all your sufferings be lost in the abyss." And he wrote:-

"My men are the best I've ever served with. I wish you could see them. You won't believe it but I am training them bloody well. My military efficiency is derived from the admirable pamphlets they send us, so different from the stuff we used to get two years ago. I can't imagine whence my flame-like ardour has come to me, but it has come. When I read your letter I began to think, "Damn Robert, damn everyone except my company" which is the smartest turn-out you ever saw. Then I thought "Damn Wales, damn leave and being wounded; damn everything except staying with my company till they're all melted away," (limping and crawling across the shell holes; lying very still in the afternoon sunshine in dignified desecrated attitudes.) And then I had lunch and got into my flea-bag and slept till six o'clock. And now I'm awake and in a better temper. Remember this when you see me (as you may do) worn out and smashed up again, querulous and nerve-ridden. Remember it when you read something in the casualty list, and get a polite letter from my solicitor... "Bad at crater-fighting!" In six weeks they'll show someone what they know about it. There never was such a battalion since 1916, and in six months they'll have ceased to exist."

Nancy's brother, Tony, was also in France now. Nancy's mother made herself ill with worrying about him. Early in July he was due to come home on leave; I was on leave myself at the end of one of the four-months cadet courses, staying with the rest of Nancy's family at a big ^{Tudor} house near Harlech.

It was the most haunted house that I have ever been in though the ghosts were invisible except in the mirrors. They would open and shut doors, rap on the oak panels, knock the shades off lamps and drink the wine from the glasses at our elbows when we were not looking. The house belonged to an officer in the Second Battalion whose ancestors had most of them died of drink. There was ^{only} one visible ghost, a little yellow dog that appeared on the lawn in the early morning to announce deaths. Nancy saw it one day.

~~This~~ was the time of the first Spanish influenza epidemic. Nancy's mother ^{caught} it, but she did not want to miss Tony when he came on leave. She wanted to go to theatres with him in London; they were devoted to each other. So when the doctor came she reduced her temperature with aspirin and pretended that she was all right. She died in London on July 13th, a few days later. While she was dying her chief feeling was one of pleasure that Tony had got his leave one, just watch the trees dressing up in green and to feel the same himself. He was beastly weak and in a rotten state of nerves. The gramophone in the ward plagued him beyond endurance. The Old Huntsman had come out that spring after all and for a joke he had sent a copy to Sir Douglas Haig. He couldn't be stopped doing that anyhow.

But she knew that the ghosts in the mirrors knew.

In June he had gone to visit the Morrells just before I left hospital at Oxford. He had no idea I was still there but he wrote that perhaps it was as well that we didn't meet, neither of us being at our best, at least one of us should be in a normal frame of mind when we were together. I had asked what he had been writing since he came home and he answered that five poems of his had appeared in the Cambridge Magazine, one of the few pacifist journals published in England at the time (the offices of which were later raided by militarist flying cadets). He said that none of them was much good except as digs at the complacent and perfectly _____ people who thought the war ought to go on indefinitely until everyone was killed except themselves. The pacifists were urging him to produce something red hot in the style of Barbusse's Under Fire but he couldn't do it, he had other things in his head, not poems. I didn't know what he meant by this but hoped that it was not a programme of assassination. He said that the thought of all that happened in France nearly drove him dotty sometimes. He was down in Kent where he could hear the guns thudding all the time across the Channel, on and on, until he didn't know whether he wanted to rush back and die with the First Battalion or stay in England and do what he could to prevent the war going on. But both courses were hopeless. To go back and get killed would be only playing up to their gallery ideas and he could think of no way of doing any good at home. His name had been sent in as a suitable instructor for an Officer Cadet Battalion in England which would keep him safe if he wanted it but it seemed dishonourable to him to undertake it.

- -

some consolation. Yet in the next sentence he said how mad it made him to think of all the good men being slaughtered that summer and all for nothing. The bloody politicians and ditto generals with their cursed incompetent blundering and callous ideas would go on until they were tired of it or had got all the kudos they wanted. He wished he could do something to protest against it. He said that if he were to shoot the Premier or Sir Souglas Haig they could only shut him up in a madhouse like Richard Dadd of glorious memory. I recognised the allusion. Dadd was an early nineteenth century painter who made out a list of people who deserved to be killed. The first on the list was his father. He picked him up and carried him on his shoulders for nearly half a mile before publicly drowning him in the Serpentine in Hyde Park. Siegfried went on to say that if he refused to go out again as a protest they would only accuse him of being afraid of shells. He asked me whether we would be any better off by the end of that summer of carnage. We would never break their line. So far, in April, we had lost more men than the Germans. The Canadians at Vemy had lost appallingly, yet the Official Communiqués were lying unblushingly about the casualties. Julian Dadd had come to see him urging him not to go out again, like everyone else who came to visit him in hospital, but he knew that it was only a beautiful dream, that he would be compelled to go on until he was killed; but the thought of going back now was agony, just when he had got back into the light again -- "oh life, oh sun." His wound was nearly healed and he expected to go for three weeks to a convalescent home in a day or two, but anywhere would be good enough if he could only be quiet and see no found it difficult to accustom himself to the idea of Nancy whom he had not met, but he still wrote. After a few months at Craiglockhart, though he in no way renounced his pacifist views, he decided that the only possible thing to do was, after all, to go back to France. He had written to me in the previous October that seeing me again had made him more restless than ever. Hospital life was nearly unbearable, the feeling of isolation was the worst. He had had a long letter from Old Joe to say that the First Battalion had just got back to rest from Polygon Wood, the conditions and general situation were more bloody than anything he had yet seen -- three miles of morasses, shell-holes and dead men and horses through which to get the rations up. Siegfried said that he would rather be anywhere than in hospital; he couldn't bear to think of poor Old Joe lying out all night in shell-holes and being shelled (several of the ration party were killed) but at least "we got the rations through to the battalion." If only the people who wrote leading articles for the Morning Post about victory could read Joe's letter. It was about this time that Siegfried wrote the poem "When I'm asleep dreaming and lulled and warm" in which he said how the spirits of the soldiers who had been killed visited his dreams to say that they had been looking for him in the Line from Ypres to Frise and had reproached him for his absence. He told Rivers that he would go back to France if they would send him, making it quite clear that his views were exactly the same as they had been in July when he had written the letter of protest -- only more so. He demanded a written guarantee that he would be sent back at once and not kept hanging about in a training battalion. He wrote reproaching me for the attitude I had taken in July, reminding me that the regiment would only understand his protest as a lapse from good form and a failure to be a gentleman. He said that it was suicidal stupidity and credulity to identify oneself in any way with good form or gentlemanliness and that if I had real courage I wouldn't acquiesce as I did. He said that I admitted that the people who sacrificed the troops were callous b_____s and that the same thing was heppening in all countries except parts of Russia. I forget how I answered Siegfried. I might have pointed out that when I was in France I was never such a fire-eater as he was. The amount of Germansthat I had killed or caused to be killed was inconsiderable compared with his slaughter. The fact was that Siegfried never really knew from time to time what he thought about the war. He varied between happy warrior and bitter pacifist. His poem

"To these I turn, in these I trust
Brother Lead and Sister Steel
To his blind power I make appeal
I guard her beauty clean from rust."

was originally written seriously enough, inspired by Colonel Campbell V.C's blood-thirsty address at an army school. Later he made a satire of it and it is a poem that comes off whichever way you read it. But after his letter of protest I did not expect him to return to the happy warrior frame again.

I have forgotten how it was worked and whether I had a hand in it, but he was sent to Palestine this time. He seemed to like it there, and I was distressed in April to have a letter from him from "Somewhere in Ephraim" that the division was moving to France. He wrote that he would be sorry to be in trenches going over the top to take Morlancourt or Méaulte. Seeing that we had recaptured Morlancourt had brought it home to him somehow. He expected that the First and Second Battalions had about ceased to exist by now for the nth time. I heard again from him at the end of May from France. He quoted Duhamel. "It was written that you should suffer without purpose and without hope, but I will not let all your sufferings be lost in the abyss." And he wrote in his happy-warrior vein that his men were the best that he'd ever served with and he wished I could see them. I mightn't believe it but he was training them bloody well. He couldn't imagine whence his flame-like ardour had come but it had come. His military efficiency was derived from the admirable pamphlets that were now issued, so different from the stuff we used to get two years before. He said that when he read my letter he began to think, damn Robert, damn everyone except his company which was the smartest turn-out ever seen and damn Wales and damn leave and damn being wounded and damn everything except staying with his company until they were all melted away. (Limping and crawling across the shell-holes, lying very still in the afternoon sunshine in dignified desecrated attitudes.) I was to remember this mood when I saw him (if I saw him) worn out and smashed up again, querulous and nerve-ridden. Or when I read something in the casualty list and got a polite letter from Mr. Lousada his solicitor. There never was such a battalion, he said, since 1916 but in six months it would have ceased to exist.

prolonged on her account, (Tony was killed two months later.)
 Nancy's mother was a far more important person to her than I was and I was alarmed of the effect that the shock of her death might have ~~on~~ ^{on the} ~~the~~ ^{day that she had died} baby. A week later I heard that Siegfried had been shot through the head while making a daylight patrol through long grass in No Man's Land. And he wrote me this letter:-

American Red Cross Hospital No.22, 98-99 Lancaster Gate, W.2.

"Dear Roberto,

"I'd timed my death in action to the minute -
 (The Nation with my deathly verses in it) -
 The day told off - 13 - (the month July) -
 The picture planned - O Threshold of the dark!
 And then, the quivering songster failed to die
 Because the bloody Bullet missed its mark.

Here I am: they would send me back - Kind M.O. at Base; Sassoon's morale grown slack; Swallowed all his proud high thoughts and acquiesced...
 O Gate of Lancaster, O Blightyland the Blessed....

No visitors allowed
 Since Friends arrived in crowd ...
 Jabber - Gesture - Jabber - Gesture - Nerves went fut and failed

After the first afternoon when MarshMoonStreetMeikleJohnArdoursandenduranSitwellitis *
 prevailed,

Caused complications and set my brain a-hop;
 Sleeplessexasperucide O Jesu make it stop.

But yesterday afternoon my reasoning Rivers ran Solemnly in. With peace in the pools of his Spectacled eyes and a wisely omnipotent grin;
 And I fished in that steady grey stream and decided that I, After all am no longer the Worm that refuses to die. But,
 A gallant and glorious lyrical soldier;
 Bolder and bolder; as he gets older;
 Shouting, "Back to the Front
 For a scrimmaging Stunt

(I wish the weather wouldn't keep on getting colder.)

(Yes, you can touch my Banker when you need him; Why keep a Jewish friend unless you bleed him?)

Oh yes, he's doing very well and sleeps from two till four.
 And there was Jolly Otaline a-knocking at the door -
 But Matron says she mustn't, not however loud she knocks, (Though she's bags of golden Daisies and some Raspberries in a box),

Be admitted to the wonderful and wild and wobbly-witted
 Sarcastic soldier-poet with a Plaster on his crown.
 Who pretends he doesn't know it - (he's the Topic of the Town).

* Visits from

* Edward Marsh, Robert Ross, Rudyard Kipling, Robert Nichols, Robert Sitwell -

My god my god I'm so excited; I've just had a letter
From Stable who's commanding the 25th Battalion.
And my company, he tells me, doing better and better,
Pinched six Saxons after lunch and bagged
Machine-guns by the bunch -

But I wasn't there
O blast, it isn't fair ...
Because they'll all be wondering why
Dotty Captain wasn't standing by
When they came marching home.

But I don't care; I made them love me although
They didn't want to do it, and I've sent them a Glorious Gramophone and God send you back to me
Over the green eviscerating sea - And I'm Ill and afraid to go back to them because those Five-nines are so damned awful.
When you think of them all bursting and you're Lying on your bed, With the books you loved and Longed for on the table; and your head, All crammed with village verses about Daffodils and geese
..... O Jesu make it cease

And I went on mechanically at my cadet-battalion work.

The candidates for commission ^{we got} were no longer gentlemen ^(in the regimental sense)
~~but they were~~ all ^{experienced} ~~returned~~ men from France ^{and} ~~and~~ were mostly Manchester cotton clerks and Liverpool shipping clerks, quiet and well-behaved. We failed about one in three. And the war went on and on. I was then writing a book of poems called Country Sentiment. Instead of children as a way of forgetting the war, I ^{used} ~~used~~ Nancy. Country Sentiment ^{dedicated to her} was a collection of romantic poems and ballads.

At the end was a group of pacifist war-poems. It contained one in which I ^{praised} ~~praised~~ the French I cannot think how I came to put so many lies in it - I even said that old Adelphe Hen of Arnegin gave me a painted china plate & that her pride was hurt when I offered to pay her. The truth is that I bought the plate from her for about fifteen shillings and that I never got it from her. Adelphe's daughter-in-law would not allow her to give it up, claiming it as her own and I never got my money back from Adelphe. This is only one of scores of my early poems that contain ^{for} ~~for~~ public delectation

In November came the Armistice. I heard at the same time news of the death of Frank Jones-Bateman, who had gone back again just before the end, and of Wilfred Owen. Armistice night hysteria did not touch the camp much, though some of the men went down to Rhyl to celebrate. The news sent me out walking ^{alone} along the dyke above the marshes of Rhuddlan, where Nancy and I now rented a cottage) ^{arranging & setting}
~~the war~~ ^{and thinking of the Jew.}

308

My god my god I'm so excited; I've just had a letter
From Stable who's commanding the 25th Battalion.
And my company, he tells me, doing better and better,
Pinched six Saxons after lunch and bagged
Machine-guns by the bunch -

But I wasn't there
O blast, it isn't fair ...
Because they'll all be wondering why
Dotty Captain wasn't standing by
When they came marching home.

But I don't care; I made them love me although
They didn't want to do it, and I've sent them a Glorious Gramophone and God send you back to me
Over the green eviscerating sea - And I'm Ill and afraid to go back to them because those Five-nines are so damned awful.
When you think of them all bursting and you're Lying on your bed, With the books you loved and Longed for on the table; and your head, All
crammed with village verses about Daffodils and geese
..... O Jesu make it cease

And I went on mechanically at my cadet-battalion work.

The candidates for commission ^{we got} were no longer gentlemen ^{in the regimental sense,}

^{but they were} all ^{experienced} ~~new~~ men from France, ^{and were} ~~mostly~~ mostly

Manchester cotton clerks and Liverpool shipping clerks, quiet and well-behaved. We failed about one in three. And the war went on and on. I was then writing a book of poems called Country Sentiment. Instead of children as a way of forgetting the war, I ^{used} ~~used~~ Nancy. Country Sentiment was a collection of romantic poems and ballads. ^{dedicated to her,} ~~dedicated to her,~~

In November came the Armistice. I heard at the same time news of the death of Frank Jones-Bateman, who had gone back again just before the end, and of Wilfred Owen. Armistice night hysteria did not touch the camp much, though some of the men went down to Rhyl to celebrate. The news sent me out walking ^{alone} along the dyke above the marshes of Rhuddlan, where Nancy and I now rented a cottage, ^{cursing and sobbing and thinking of} ~~its dead.~~

At the end was a group of pacifist war-poems. It contained one in which I praise ~~the French~~ the French. I cannot think how I came to put so many lies in it - I even said that old Adelpheine Hen of Anzezon gave me a painted china plate and that her pride was hurt when I offered to pay her. The truth is that I bought the plate from her for about fifteen shillings and that I never got it from her. Adelpheine's daughter-in-law would not allow her to give it up ^{but} claiming it as her ^{own} and I never got my money back from Adelpheine. This is only one of ^{many} of my early poems that contain falsities intended to flatter ^{for} public delectation.

309

CHAPTER XXIII.

~~██████████~~ December the cadet-battalions were wound up and the officers sent back to their units. The Third Battalion of the Royal Welch was now at Limerick. ~~██████████~~

~~██████████~~ expecting ~~██████████~~ early in January ~~██████████~~ ~~██████████~~ her father had taken a house for the occasion.

~~██████████~~ Jenny ~~██████████~~ was born on Twelfth Night. She was neither affected by the shocks of the previous months ~~██████████~~ coal-black, ~~██████████~~

~~██████████~~ it took her years to recover from the shock. I went over to Limerick; the battalion was ~~██████████~~ the Castle Barracks. ~~██████████~~ Limerick was a Sinn Fein stronghold and there were constant clashes between the troops and the young men of the town, yet little ill-feeling; Welsh and Irish got on well together, as ~~██████████~~ as Welsh and Scottish disagreed. The Royal Welch had the situation well in hand; they made a joke of politics and used their entrenching-tool handles as shillelaghs. ~~██████████~~ looked like a town that had been through the war. The main streets had holes in them like shell craters and many of the bigger houses seemed on the point of collapse. I was told by an old man at an antique shop that no new houses were now built in Limerick, that when one house fell down the survivors moved into another. He said too that everyone died of drink in Limerick except the Plymouth Brethren, who died of religious melancholia. Life did not start in the city before about a quarter past nine in the morning. At nearly nine o'clock once I walked down O'Connell Street and found it deserted. When the hour chimed, the door of a magnificent Georgian house was flung open and out came, first a shower of slops, which just missed me, then a dog, which lifted up its leg against the lamp-post, then a nearly naked child which sat down in the gutter and rummaged in a heap of refuse for dirty pieces of bread; finally a donkey, which began to bray.

X Jenny had had no idea
I assumed that she knew

Once I was writing a rhyme nonna letter to

Nancy Jenny

Is there any song sweet enough
For Nancy or for Jenny?
Said Simple Simon to the Pieman:
'Indeed, I know not any.'

I have counted the miles to Babylon,
I have flown the earth like a bird,
I have ridden cock-horse to Banbury Cross,
But no such song have I heard.

At that moment some companies of the battalion returned to Barracks from a route-march; the drums and fifes drew up under my window making the panes rattle with the British Grenadiers. The insistent repetition of the tune and the hoarse words of command as the ^{parade} formed up, company by company, in the square challenged Banbury Cross and Babylon. The British Grenadiers succeeded ^{for a moment} in forcing their way into the poem;

but they were driven out

*Some speak of Alexander,
And some of Hercules,
But where are there any like Nancy and Jenny,
Where are there any like these?*

I ^{had} ceased to be a British Grenadier.

I decided to get demobilised as soon as possible. I consulted the priority list of trades for demobilisation and found that agricultural workers and students were among the first classes to go. I did not want to be a student. I would rather have been an agricultural worker (Nancy and I ^{spoke of} farm ^{inf} when the war ended) but I ^{had no agricultural background}. ^{about that} I found that I could take a two years' course at Oxford with a government grant of two hundred pounds a year and would be excused the intermediate examination (Mods.) on account of war-service. The preliminary examination (Smalls) I had already been excused because of a certificate examination that I had taken while still at Charterhouse. So there only remained ^{the} Finals. The grant would be increased by a childrens' allowance. This ~~_____~~ Ireland was exactly as I had pictured it.

I felt its ~~_____~~ ^{chaos} ~~_____~~ ^{as} dangerous ~~_____~~ ^{yet} when I was detailed to take out a search party in a neighbouring village for concealed rifles I asked the adjutant to find a substitute; I said that I was an Irishman and did not wish to be mixed up in Irish politics.

at the time

sounded good enough. It seemed absurd to suppose that University degrees would count for anything in ^{a regenerated} post-war England; but Oxford was a convenient place to mark time until I felt more like working for my living. We were ^{all} so accustomed to the war-time view that the only possible qualification for peace-time employment ~~was to have~~ ^{would be} shown a good record of service in the field, that we took it for granted that ~~our~~ ^{would get us whatever we wanted} our scars and our Commanding Officers' testimonials ~~would~~ ^{secure} ~~us~~ ^{for} ~~employment~~. A few of my fellow-officers did ~~manage~~ ^{as a matter of fact} to take advantage of the patriotic spirit of employers before it cooled again, ~~and~~ ^{sliding} into jobs for which they were not properly qualified.

Not to mention table-manners at which Sergeant Talley would stand aghast. There were now two mess ante-rooms, the junior and the senior yet of a junior officer was regimentally a gentleman (belonged that is, to the North Wales Landers) sentry or had been through Sandhurst he was invited to use the senior ante-room and he was an officer.

I wrote to a friend in the Demobilisation Department of the War Office asking him to expedite my demobilisation. He wrote back that he would do his best, but that I must be certified not to have had charge of government-money for the last six months; ^{and} I had not. But the adjutant had just decided to put me in command of a company. He said that he was short of officers whom he knew could be trusted with company accounts. ~~The~~ ^{new-army} latest arrivals from the ~~battalions~~ ^{of the new-army} were a constant shame ~~to the~~ ^{and drunk} senior officers. Paternity-orders, stumer cheques ~~on parade~~ ^{of frequent}, ~~were~~ ^{All this} must have seemed very strange to the three line-battalion second-lieutenants captured in 1914, ~~and~~ ^{now} set free by the terms of the Armistice. ~~and~~ ^{most of} ~~promoted~~ ^{promoted} captains by the death of ~~their~~ ^{most of} contemporaries.

The adjutant cancelled the ^{intended} appointment only when I promised to help him with the battalion theatricals that were being arranged for St. David's Day; I ~~was~~ ^{undertook to} play Cassius in Julius Caesar. ~~My~~ ^{His} change of mind saved me ~~two~~ ^{over} hundred pounds. ~~Next~~ ^{His} day the senior lieutenant in the company that I was to have taken over went off with the company cash-box, and I would have been legally responsible.

~~Before~~ ^{Before} the war he used to give displays at Blackpool Pier as The Handcuff King; he got away safely to America.

I went out a few miles from Limerick to visit my uncle Robert Cooper at Cooper's Hill. He was a farmer, a retired naval officer, and had been having his ricks burnt and cattle driven. He was very despondent. Through the window he showed me distant cattle grazing beside the Shannon. "They have been out there all winter," he said, "and I haven't had the heart to go out and look at them these three months." I spent the night at Cooper's Hill and woke up with a chill. [redacted], I knew that it ^{was the beginning of} [redacted] influenza. At the barracks I found that the War Office telegram had come through for my demobilisation, but that all demobilisation among troops in Ireland was to be stopped, because of the troubles there, for an indefinite period. [redacted] on the following day. The adjutant, [redacted] ^{showing me} the telegram, said, "We're not going to let you go. You promised to help us with those theatricals." I protested, but he was firm. I ^{did not intend to have} [redacted] my influenza out in an Irish military hospital with my lungs in their present state. I had to think quickly. I decided to make a run for it. The Orderly Room sergeant ^{had} ^{made} [redacted] my papers ^{on receipt of the telegram} [redacted] out. I had all my kit ready packed. There only remained ^{two things together} [redacted] the colonel's signature to the statement that I had handled no company-moneys, [redacted] and the secret code-marks which only the battalion demobilisation-officer could supply, ^{but} [redacted] he was hand-in-glove with the adjutant so it was no use asking him for them. The last train before demobilisation ended was the 6.15 from Limerick the same evening, February 13th. I decided to wait until the adjutant had left the Orderly Room and ^{then} casually ask the colonel to sign the statement without mentioning the adjutant's objection to my going. The adjutant remained in the Orderly Room until five minutes past six. As soon as he was out of sight I hurried in, saluted, got the colonel's signature, saluted, hurried out to collect my baggage. I had counted on a ^{jaunting-car} [redacted] at the barrack gates but none was to be seen. I had about ^{five} [redacted] minutes left ^{now} and the station was a good distance away. I saw a corporal who had been with me in the First Battalion. I shouted to him, "Corporal

Summers, quick! Get a squad of men. I've got ~~my ticket~~ and I want to catch the ^{last} train ^{back}!" Summers promptly called four men, they picked up my stuff and doubled off with it, left, right, left, to the station. I tumbled into the train as it was moving out of the station and threw a pound-note to Corporal Summers, "Good-bye, corporal, drink my health."

But still I had not my demobilisation code-marks and ~~I~~ knew that when I reached the demobilisation centre at Wimbledon they would refuse to pass me out. I did not care ^{very} much. Wimbledon was in England and I would at least have my influenza out in an English and not an Irish hospital. My temperature was running high now ~~and~~ ^{and} my mind was working clearly as it always does in fever. My visual imagery, which is ~~very~~ ^{doubtful} partial at ordinary times, becomes defined and complete. At Fishguard I bought a copy of the South Wales Echo and read in it that there ~~would~~ ^{would} be a strike of London Electric Railways the next day, February 14th, if the railway directors would not meet the men's demands. So when the train steamed into Paddington and while it was still moving I jumped out, fell down, picked myself up and ran across to the station entrance where in spite of competition from porters ^{a pebble crew at this time} I caught the only taxi in the station as its fare stepped out. I had forseen the taxi-shortage and could afford to waste no time getting to Wimbledon. I brought my taxi back to the train where scores of stranded officers looked at me with envy. One, who had travelled down ^{in my compartment} ~~in my compartment~~ had been met by his wife. I said, "Excuse me, but would you like to share my taxi anywhere? (I have influenza, I warn you.) I'm going down to Wimbledon so I only need go as far as Waterloo; the steam-trains are still running." They were delighted; they said that they lived out at Ealing and had no idea how to get there except by taxi. On the way to Waterloo he said to me, "I wish there was some way of showing our gratitude. I wish there was something we could do for you." I said, "Well, there is only one thing in the world that I want at the moment. But you can't give it to me I'm afraid. And that," I said, "is the proper code-marks to complete my demobilisation form. I've bolted from Ireland without them and there'll be hell to pay if the Wimbledon people send me back." He rapped on the glass of the taxi and stopped it. Then he got down his bag, opened it, and produced a satchel of army-forms. He said, "Well, I happen to be the ^{Cork} District Demobilisation Officer [redacted] and I've got the whole bag of tricks here." So he filled my papers in.

At Wimbledon, instead of ^{having to wait in a queue} [redacted] for nine or ten hours as I had expected, I was given priority and released at once; Ireland was officially a "theatre of war" and demobilisation from theatres of war had priority over home-service demobilisation. So after a hurried ^{visit} [redacted] to my parents, ^{who were living close by} [redacted] I continued to Hove, ^{at} [redacted] at supper-time. I [redacted]

[redacted] looking rather plump and staid and dressed unlike herself, ^{Nancy's mother.} She was sitting at the table between [redacted] and did not appear to recognise me. It was like a bad dream; I did not know what to say or do. I knew I was ill; ^{but} this was worse than illness. ^{Then} Nicholson introduced me, "This is Nancy's Aunt Dora just over from Canada." [redacted]

[redacted] ^{new fare, warned} I [redacted] them all [redacted] ^{that} I had influenza; and hurried ^{off} to bed. ^{Within a day or two} everybody in the house ^{had} caught it [redacted] except ^{and} Nicholson, the baby and one servant who kept it off by a Gipsy's charm. I think it was the leg of a lizard tied

When I came in I had a sudden fever that made me unable to speak. I seemed to see Nancy's mother. She was in a bag round her neck. A new epidemic as bad as the summer one had started; there was not a nurse to be had in Brighton. Nicholson at last found two ex-nurses. One was competent but frequently drunk and when she was drunk would ^{ransack} ~~rob~~ all the wardrobes and pile the contents into her own bags; the other, sober but incompetent, would stand a dozen times a day in front of the open window, spread out her arms, and cry in a stage-voice, "Sea, sea, give my husband back to me." The husband, by the way was not drowned, merely unfaithful. A doctor, found with difficulty, said that I had no chance of recovering; it was septic pneumonia now and both my lungs were affected. But I had determined that ^{having come through} ~~war~~ ^{I would not allow myself} to succumb to Spanish influenza. This now was the third time in my life that I had been given up as dying, and each time ^{because of} ~~it was~~ my lungs, ~~the~~ ^{been} ~~had~~. The first occasion was when I was seven years old and had double pneumonia following measles. ^{malicious} ~~some~~ ^{yet} ~~my~~ lungs are naturally very sound. ^{probably the strongest part of me and therefore my danger mark} ~~So~~ this time again I recovered and was up a few weeks later in time to see the mutiny of the Guards, when about a thousand men of all regiments marched out from Shoreham Camp and paraded through the streets of Brighton in protest against camp discipline.

The reaction against military discipline between the armistice and the signing of peace delighted Siegfried and myself. We half-hoped that there would be a general rising of ex-service men against the ^{coalition-} government, but it was not to be. ^{Once back in} ~~England~~ the men were content to have a roof over their heads, civilian food, ^{beer that was at least better than French beer} and enough blankets at night. They might find overcrowding in their ^{homes} ~~but~~ this ~~could be~~ ^{nothing} to what they had been accustomed to; in France a derelict four-roomed cottage would provide billets for sixty men. They had won the war and they were satisfied.

They left the rest to Lloyd George. The only serious outbreak was at Harlech when there was a two days meeting of Canadians with much destruction and several deaths.

The signal for the outbreak was the cry, "Come on, Bolshinks!"
When I was well enough to travel, Nancy, I and the baby went up to Harlech, where Nicholson had lent us his house to live in. We were there for a year. I discarded my uniform, having worn nothing else for four and a half years, and looked into my school trunk to see what I had to wear.

There was only one suit that was not school-uniform and I had grown out of that. I found it difficult to believe that the war was over. When I had last been a civilian I had been still at school, so I had no experience of independent civilian life. The Harlech villagers treated me with the greatest respect. On the Peace Day celebrations in the Castle I was asked, as the senior of the officers present who had served overseas, to make a speech about the glorious dead. I have forgotten what I said but it was in commendation of the Welshman as a fighting man, and was loudly cheered. I was still mentally and nervously organised for war; shells used to come bursting on my bed at midnight even when Nancy was sharing it with me; strangers in day-time would assume the faces of friends who had been killed. When I was strong enough to climb the hill behind Harlech and revisit my favourite country I found that I could only see it as a prospective battlefield. I would find myself working out tactical problems, planning how I would hold the Northern Artro valley against an attack from the sea, or where I would put a Lewis gun if I were trying to rush Dolwreiddiog farm from the brow of the hill, and what would be the best position for the rifle-grenade section. I still had the army habit of commandeering anything that I found lying about, of uncertain ownership also a difficulty in telling the truth - it was always easier for me now when overtaken in any fault to lie my way out. But I ^{slightly} modified my language, which had suddenly become foul on the day of Loos and had been foul ever since [REDACTED] [REDACTED] I applied the technique of taking over billets or trenches to a review of my present situation. Food, water supply, possible dangers, communication, sanitation, protection against the weather, fuel and lighting - each item was ticked off as satisfactory. And other loose habits of war-time survived, such as stopping passing motors for a lift, talking without embarrassment to my fellow travellers in railway carriages, and unbuttoning by the road-side without sham^e whoever was about. And I retained the technique of endurance, a brutal persistence in seeing things through, somehow, anyhow, without finesse, satisfied with the main points of any situation. The chief difference between war and peace was money. I had never had to worry about that [REDACTED] since my first days at Wrexham; I had even put by about £150 of my pay, invested in War Bonds. Neither Nancy^r or I knew the value of money and this £150 and my war bonus of, I think) [REDACTED] £250, and a disability pension that I was now drawing of £60 a year, and the occasional money that I got from poetry seemed a great deal^{all together}. We engaged a nurse and a general servant and lived as though we had an income of about a thousand a year. Nancy spent much of her time drawing^x (she was illustrating some poems of mine), and I was busy getting Country Sentiment in order and writing reviews.

I was very thin, very nervous and had about four years' loss of sleep to make up. I found that I was suffering from a large sort of intestinal worm which came from drinking bad water in France. I was now waiting until I ^{should be} well enough to go to Oxford with the Government educational grant; it seemed the easiest thing to do. I knew that it would be years before I was fit for anything ~~but~~ ^{besides} a quiet country life. There was no profession that I wished to take up, though ~~xxxxxxx~~ for awhile I considered school-mastering. My disabilities were ~~many~~ many: I could not use a telephone, I was sick every time I travelled in a train, and if I saw more than two new people in a single day it prevented me from sleeping. I was ashamed of myself as a drag on Nancy. I had been much better when I was at Rhyl ~~but~~ but my recent pneumonia had set me back to my condition of 1917.

Siegfried had gone to live at Oxford as soon as he was demobilised, expecting me to join him. ~~But~~ But after being there ~~for~~ for a term or so he became literary editor of the newly published Daily Herald. He gave me books to review for it. In these days the Daily Herald was not respectable. It was violent. It was anti-militarist. It was the only daily paper that protested against the Versailles Treaty and the blockade of Russia by the British Fleet. The Versailles Treaty shocked me ~~by~~ ~~it~~ it seemed ~~to~~ ^{certainly} to lead to another war and yet nobody cared. When the most critical decisions were being taken at Paris, public interest was concentrated entirely on three home-news items: Hawker's Atlantic flight and rescue, the marriage of Lady Diana Manners, and a marvellous horse called ~~The~~ Panther^m, which was the Derby favourite and came in nowhere. The Herald ~~every~~ every morning ~~spoilt~~ spoilt our breakfast for us. We read in it of unemployment all over the country, due to the closing of munitions factories, of ex-service men refused replacement in the jobs that they had left in the early stages of the war, of market-rigging, lock-outs, and abortive strikes. I began to hear news^{for} of my mother's relatives in Germany and the penury to which they had been reduced, particularly those who were retired officials and whose pension, by the collapse of the mark, was reduced to a few shillings a week. Nancy and I ~~took all this to heart~~ ~~now called ourselves~~ socialists.

The attitude of my family was doubtful. I had fought gallantly for my country, indeed I was the only one of my ~~father's five sons of military age~~ who had seen active service, and was entitled to every consideration because of my shell-shocked condition; ~~but~~ my socialism and sympathy ~~for the~~ Bolsheviks ~~was~~ ~~national~~ ~~on traced there~~. I once more forfeited the ~~good will~~ of my uncle Charles. My father tried to talk me over, reminding me that my brother Philip had been a pro-Boer once and a Fenian, but had recovered from his youthful revolutionary idealism and come out all right in the end. Most of the elder members of my family were in the near East, either married to British officials, or British officials themselves. My father hoped that when I was recovered I would go to Egypt, perhaps in the consular service where the family influence would be of great service to me, and there get over my revolutionary idealism. Socialism with Nancy was rather a means to a single end. The ~~most~~ important thing to her was ~~judicial~~ equality of the sexes; she held that all the wrong in the world ~~was caused by male domination~~ economic troubles, ~~and narrowness.~~ She refused to see my experiences in the war as in any way comparable with the ~~_____~~ that millions of ^{married} women of the working classes went through, ~~_____~~

~~_____~~ This at least had the effect of putting the war into the background for me; I was devoted to Nancy and respected her views. Male stupidity and callousness became an obsession with her and she found it difficult not to include me in her universal condemnation of men. It came to the point later when she could not ~~_____~~ ^{bear} ~~_____~~ a newspaper in the house. She was afraid of coming across something that would horrify her, some paragraph about the necessity of keeping up the population, or about women's intelligence, or about the modern girl, or anything at all about women written by clergymen. ~~He~~ became

It was a great grief to my parents that Jenny was not baptised. My father wrote to Nancy's godfather, who also happened to be my publisher, asking him to use his influence with Nancy, for whose religion he had promised at the font to be responsible, to make her give ~~_____~~ ^{the} child Christian baptism. They were scandalised too that Nancy, finding that it was legal to keep her own name for all purposes, refused to allow herself to be called Mrs. Graves in any circumstances. At first I had been doubtful about this, thinking ^{that} perhaps it was not worth the trouble and suspicion that it caused; but when I saw that Nancy was now treated as ~~_____~~ ^{being written} ~~_____~~ personal ~~_____~~ ^{validity} I was converted. At that time there was no Equal Guardianship; ~~_____~~ the children were the sole property of the father, the mother was not legally a parent. ~~We~~ worked it out later that ^{our} ~~the~~ children were to be ^{thought of as} solely hers, but that since I looked after them ^{so much} ~~_____~~ the boys ^{should} ~~_____~~ take the name of Graves ~~_____~~ the girls ^{_____} ~~_____~~ ^{taking} Nicholson. ~~_____~~

members of the newly formed Constitutional Society and I introduced it
What was among the village women, to the scandal of my family.

has always

- 321 -

This of course baffled ^{my} parents. Nor could ^{they} understand the ^{then} intimacy of our relations with the nurse and the maid; they were both women to whom we had given a job because they were in bad luck. One of them was a girl who had had ^a child during the war by a soldier, to whom she was engaged ^{to} who ^{got} killed in France. Generosity to a woman like this ^{was} Christian, but ^{intimacy} ^{seemed} ^{merely} ^{eccentric}.

CHAPTER XXIV.

In October 1919 I went up to Oxford at last. The lease of the Harlech house was ended and Nicholson gave us the furniture to take with us. The ~~city~~ ^{city} was overcrowded; the lodging-house keepers, some of whom had nearly starved during the war, now had their rooms booked up terms ahead and charged accordingly. Keble College had put up army huts for its surplus students. There was not an unfurnished house to be had anywhere within the ^{University} three-mile radius. I solved the difficulty by getting permission from ~~my~~ ^{my} College authorities to live five miles out ^{on} ~~at~~ Boar's Hill; I pleaded my lungs. John Masefield, who liked my poetry, offered to rent us a cottage at the bottom of his garden.

The University was very quiet. The returned soldiers had little temptation to rag about, break windows, get drunk or have tussles with the police and races with the Bulldogs as before the war. The boys straight ~~from~~ from the public-schools were quiet too. They had had the war preached at them continually for four years, had been told that they must carry on loyally at home while their brothers were serving in the trenches, and must make themselves worthy of such sacrifices. The boys ^{had been leaving} ~~left~~ for the cadet-battalions at the age of seventeen, so that the masters had it all their own way; trouble at public-schools nearly always comes from the eighteen-year olds. G. N. Clarke, a history don at Oriel, who had been up at Oxford just before the war and had meanwhile been an infantryman in France and a prisoner in Germany, told me, "I can't make out my pupils at all. They are all 'Yes, sir' and 'No, sir.'" They seem positively to thirst for knowledge and they scribble away in their note-books like lunatics. I can't remember a single instance of ^{such} stern endeavour in pre-war days." The ex-service men - they included scores of captains, majors, colonels, and even a one-armed twenty-five year old brigadier - though not rowdy were insistent on their rights. At St. John's they formed what they called a Soviet, ^{x demanding} an entire revision of the college catering-system; they won their point and an undergraduate representative was chosen to sit on the kitchen-committee. The elders, whom I had often seen during the war ^x trembling fear of an invasion of Oxford, with the sacking and firing of the colleges and the rape of the Woodstock and Banbury Roads, and who had regarded all soldiers, myself included, as their noble saviours, now recovered their pre-war self-possession. I was amused at the ^{difference in manner to} ^{me that some of them showed.}

My moral tutor, however, though he no longer saluted me when we met, remained a friend; he prevailed on the college to allow me to change my course from Classics to English Language and Literature and to take up my £60 Classical Exhibition notwithstanding. I was glad now that it was an exhibition; ^{though} in 1913 I had been disappointed that it was not a scholarship; ^h college regulations permitted exhibitioners to be married, ^c scholars had to remain single.

I used to bicycle down from Boar's Hill every morning to my lectures. On the way down I ^{would} collect Edmund Blunden who was attending the same course. ^{too} He had ^{permission} to live on the hill, ^{on account} of gassed lungs. I had been in correspondence with Edmund some time before he came to Oxford. Siegfried, when literary editor of the Herald, had been among the first to recognise him as a poet, and now I was helping him get his Wagoner through the press. Edmund had war-shock as badly as myself; and we would talk each other into an almost hysterical state about the ^{French} [redacted]. We agreed that we would not be right until we got all that talk on to paper. [redacted]

[redacted] He was first with Undertones of War, ^{published in 1920} [redacted]

Edmund and Mary his wife ^{rented} [redacted] ^{of a} two-room cottage ^{belonging to} Mrs. Delilah Becker, locally known as the Jubilee Murderess. She was a fine looking old lady and used to read her prayer-book and bible aloud to herself every night; sitting at the open window. The prayer-book was out of date; she used to pray for the Prince Consort and Adelaide, the Queen Dowager. [redacted] her husband [redacted] she was said to have murdered. In Jubilee Year she had gone away for a holiday, leaving her husband in the cottage with a half-witted servant-girl. News came to her that he had got the servant-girl into trouble. She wrote to him, "Dear husband, if I find you in my cottage when I come back you shall be no more." He did not believe her and she found him in the cottage, and sure enough he was no more. She told the police that he had gone away when he saw how angry with him she was; but no one had seen him go. He had even left his silver watch behind, ticking on a nail on the bedroom wall. The neighbours swore that she had buried him in the garden. Mary Blunden said that it was more probable that he was buried somewhere in ^{that part of the cottage, which was semi-detached.} [redacted]. "There's an awfully funny smell about here sometimes," she said. Old Delilah said to Mary once, "I have often wondered what has happened to the old pepper-and-salt suit he had on when he was ^{went out} when he went away." Whenever she left [redacted] she ^{took} [redacted] the carving knife out of the drawer and ^{laid} [redacted] it ^{where it could be seen by them when they went past her window.} [redacted] on the kitchen table. I liked Delilah very much and sent her a pound of tea every year until her death. Her comment on used to say:

She also
"While there's wind and water a man's all right."

life in general was, "Fair play's good sport, and we're all mortal worms." [redacted]

[redacted]
[redacted]
[redacted]

I found the English literature course tedious. ^{especially eighteenth-} [redacted] century. ^{facts} [redacted] My tutor, Mr. Percy Simpson, the editor of Ben Jonson's ^{plays} sympathised. He said that he had once suffered for his preference for the Romantic Revivalists. He had been beaten by his schoolmaster for having a Shelley in his possession. He had protested between the blows, "Shelley is beautiful! Shelley is beautiful!"

[redacted]

But he warned me that I must on no account ^{disparage} [redacted] the eighteenth century ^{the} [redacted] when I sat for my final examination. It was ^{cases and genders and irregular verbs in} difficult for me ^{to} [redacted] to concentrate on Anglo-Saxon grammar. The Anglo-Saxon lecturer was candid about his subject. He said that it was of purely linguistic interest, that there was hardly a line of Anglo-Saxon extant of the slightest literary merit. I disagreed; Beowulf and Judith seemed good poems to me. Beowulf lying wrapped in a blanket among his platoon of drunken thanes in the Gothland billet; Judith ^{going} ~~coming~~ for a promenade to Holofernes's staff-tent, and Brunanburgh with its bayonet-and-cosh fighting

^{all this was} [redacted] closer to most of us at the time than the drawing-room and deer-park atmosphere of the eighteenth century. Edmund and I found ourselves translating everything into trench-warfare terms. The war was not yet over for us [redacted]

[redacted] In the middle of a lecture I would have a sudden very clear experience of men on the march up the Bethune-La Bassée road; the men would be singing and French children would be running along beside them calling out "Tomme, tomme, give me bullee beef;" and I would smell the stench of the knacker's yard just outside the town. Or I would be in Laventie High Street passing a company billet; an N.C.O. would roar out, "Party, 'shun!" and the Second Battalion men in shorts, with brown knees and brown expressionless faces, would spring to their feet from the broken steps where they sitting. Or I would be in a barn with my first platoon of the Welsh Regiment watching them play Nap by the light of dirty candle stumps. Or it would be a deep dug-out at Cambrin where I was talking to a signaller. I would look up the shaft and see somebody's muddy legs coming down the steps and then there would be a crash and the tobacco smoke in the dug-out would shake with the concussion and twist about in patterns like the marbling on books. These day-dreams persisted like an alternate life. Indeed they did not leave me until well on in 1928. I noticed that the scenes were nearly always recollections of ^{my} first four months in France; it seemed as though the emotion-recording apparatus had failed after Loos.

I disliked the eighteenth century because it was French. Anti-French feeling among most ex-soldiers amounted almost to an obsession. Edmund, shaking with nerves, used to say at this time, "No more wars for me at any price. Except against the French. If there's ever a war with them I'll go like a shot." Pro-German feeling was increasing. Now that the war was over and the German armies had been beaten it was possible to give the German soldier credit for being the best fighting man in Europe. I ^{often} heard it said that ^{it was} only the blockade ^{that} had beaten them; ^{that} in Haig's last push they never really broke and ^{that} their machine-gun sections had held us up for as long as was needed to cover the withdrawal of the main forces. And ^{even} that we had been fighting on the wrong side; our natural enemies were the French.

them calling out "Tomme, tomme, give me bullee feel;" and I would smell the stench of the knacker's yard just outside the town. Or I would be in Laventie High Street passing a company billet; an N.C.O. would roar out, "Party, 'shun!" and the Second Battalion men in shorts with brown knees and brown expressionless faces, would spring to their feet from the broken steps where they were sitting. Or I would be in a barn-winery that platoon of the Welsh Regiment watching them play Nap by the light of dirty candle stumps. Or it would be a deep dug-out at Cambrai where I was talking to a signaller. I would look up the shaft and see somebody's muddy legs coming down the steps and then there would be a crash and the tobacco smoke in the dug-out would shake with the concussion and twist about in patterns like the marbling on books. These day-dreams persisted like an alternate life.
 Indeed they did not leave me until well on in 1928. I noticed that the scenes were nearly always recollections of the first four months in France; it seemed as though the emotion-recording apparatus had failed after 1000.
 I disliked the eighteenth century because it was French.
 Anti-French feeling among most ex-soldiers amounted almost to an obsession. Edmund, shaking with nerves, used to say at this time, "No more wars for me at any price. Except against the French. If there's ever a war with them I'll go like a shot." Pro-German feeling was increasing. Now that the war was over and the German armies had been beaten it was possible to give the German soldier credit for being the best fighting man in Europe. I heard it said that only the blockade had beaten them; in Haig's last push they never really broke and their machine-gun sections had held us up for as long as was needed to cover the withdrawal of the main forces. And that we had been fighting on the wrong side; our natural enemies were the French.

At the end of my first term's work I attended the usual college board to give an account of myself. The spokesman coughed and said a little stiffly, "I understand, Mr. Graves, that the essays that you write for your English tutor are, shall I say, a trifle temperamental. It appears indeed that you prefer some authors to others."

There were a number of poets living on Bear's Hill; too many, Edmund and I agreed. It had become almost a tourist centre. There was the Poet Laureate with his bright eye, abrupt challenging manner, flower in his buttonhole; he was one of the first men of letters to sign a recantation of war-time hatred against the Germans. There was Gilbert Murray too, gentle-voiced and with the spiritual look of the strict vegetarian, doing preliminary propaganda work for the League of Nations. ~~once while I was sitting~~ ^{about Aristotle's Politics} talking to him in his study and he was walking up and down the room. I asked him, "Exactly what is the principle of that walk of yours? Are you trying to avoid the flowers on the rug or are you trying to keep to the squares?" I had a compulsion-nervousness of this sort myself so it was easy to notice one in him. He wheeled round sharply; "You're the first person who has caught me out," he said, "No, it's not the flowers or the squares; it's a habit that I have got into of doing things in sevens. I take seven steps, you see, then I change direction and go another seven steps, then I turn round. I asked Browne, the Professor of Psychology, about it the other day but he assured me that it wasn't a dangerous habit. He said, 'When you find it getting into multiples of seven, come to me again.'"

I saw most of Jan Masfield, a nervous, generous, ~~very sensitive to criticism~~ who seemed to have suffered greatly in the war, when an orderly in a Red Cross unit; he was now working at Reynard the Fox. He wrote in a hut in his garden surrounded by tall gorse-bushes and only appeared at meal times. In the evening he used to read his day's work over to Mrs. Masefield and they would correct it together. Masefield was at the height of his reputation at the time and there was a constant flow of American visitors to his door. Mrs. Masefield protected Jan. She was from the north of Ireland, a ~~careful~~ ^(and sociability) careful manager, and put a ^{We admired the way that she stood up for her rights where less resolute people would have shrank back} ^{necessary} brake on Jan's generosity. The tale of Mrs. Masefield and the rabbit. Some neighbours of ours had a particularly stupid Airedale; they were taking it for a walk past the Masefield's house when a ^{wild} rabbit ran ~~from the~~ ^{Masefields} gorse plantation across the road. The Airedale dashed at it and missed as usual. ~~The~~ rabbit, not giving it sufficient credit for stupidity and slowness, doubled back; ~~but~~ found the dog not yet recovered from its mistake and ran right into its jaws. The dog's owners were delighted at the brilliant performance of their pet, recovered the rabbit, which was a small and inexperienced one, and took it home ^{for the first}. Mrs. Masefield had seen the ^{business} ~~from the other side of the~~ fence. ~~It was not a public road and the rabbit was therefore legally hers.~~ That evening there came a knock at the door. "Come in, oh do come in, Mrs. Masefield." It was Mrs. Masefield coming for the skin of her rabbit. Rabbit-skins were worth a lot in 1920. Mrs. Masefield's one extravagance was bridge; she used to play at a halfpenny a hundred, "to steady ^{her} play", she ^{told us} ~~she~~. She kept goats which used to be tethered near our cottage and ^{which} bleated. She was a good landlord to us, and advised Nancy to keep up with ^{me} ~~me~~ intellectually if she wished to keep ^{my} ~~her~~ affections.

Another poet on Boar's Hill was Robert Nichols, still another neurasthenic ex-soldier, with his flame-opal ring, his wide-brimmed hat, his flapping arms and "mournful grandeur" in repose (the phrase is from a review by Sir Edmund Gosse). Nichols ~~only~~ ^{was} served three weeks in France, in the gunners, and ~~was~~ ^{was} in no show, but he was highly strung and the three weeks affected him more than twelve months ^{affected} some people. He ~~was~~ ^{was} invalided out of the army and ~~went~~ ^{went} to lecture in America for the Ministry of Information ~~on~~ British war poets. He read Siegfried's and my poetry ^{and apparently gave some account of us: ~~and~~} a legend was started of Siegfried, Robert and myself as the new Three Musketeers. Not only was Robert not in the Royal Welch Fusiliers with Siegfried and myself, but the three of us have never been together in the same room in our lives.

That winter George and Ruth Mallory invited Nancy and myself to ~~go~~ ^{go} climbing with them. ^{But} Nancy could not stand heights and was having another baby, ^{for myself,} and I realised that ~~my~~ my climbing days were over. ~~I~~

~~My nerves~~ ^{+ My nerves} were bad, though possibly still good enough for an emergency, ^{and beyond improvement.} ~~I~~ ^{at this time} ~~was~~ ^{was} foolhardy ^{however.} Nancy and I were visiting my parents at Harlech. My two younger brothers were at the house. They played golf and mixed with local society. One evening they arranged a four at bridge with a young ex-airman and a Canadian colonel who was living in a house on the plain between Harlech castle and the sea. The elder of my brothers got toothache; I said that I would take his place. The younger, still at Charterhouse, demurred. He was rather ashamed of me now as a non-golfer, a ^{socialist} and not quite a gentleman. And my bridge might discredit him. I insisted, because at that time Canadian colonels interested me, and he ^{try not to outrage} made the best of it. I assured him that I would ~~not~~ his feelings. The colonel was about forty-five - tough, nervous, however, I was drawn into one whisky-drinking, a killer. He was out of sorts: he said that his missus was upstairs with a headache and could not come down. We played three or four rubbers; I was playing [redacted] steadily ^{and not ignorant} my brother [redacted] of. The colonel was drinking, [redacted] the airman was competing. Finally the colonel said in a temper: "By God, this is the rottenest bridge I've ever sat down to. Let's go bathing!" It was half past ten and [redacted] not warm for January, but we went bathing and ^{afterwards} dried ourselves on pocket handkerchiefs. "We" was the colonel, myself and my brother. The airman excused himself. The bathe put the colonel in better humour. "Let's go up to the village ^{now} and raid the Concert [redacted]. Let's pull some of the girls out and have a bit of fun." The airman gigglingly agreed. My brother seemed embarrassed. The colonel said, "And you, you bloody poet, are you on?" I said angrily, "Not yet. You've had your treat, colonel. I went bathing ^{and it was cold} with you! Now it's my treat. I'm going to take you climbing ^{and make you hot}. I want to see whether you Canucks are all B.S. or not." That diverted him.

[redacted] I took them up the Castle rock from the railway-station. ^{in the dark} After the first piece, which was tricky, there ^{would have been} little climbing necessary. [redacted] ^{if I had followed a zig-zag} path; ^{but I preferred to lead} [redacted] several fairly stiff ^{paths. The others kept to the path.} [redacted] the colonel [redacted] When we reached the top he was out of breath, a bit shaky, and most affable ^X almost affectionate. "That was a dam good climb you showed us." So I said, "We've not reached the top yet." "Where are we going now?" he asked. I said, "Up that turret." We climbed into the castle and walked through the chapel into the north-western tower. It was pitch-dark. I took them ^{which adjoined the tower but rose some twenty feet higher.} left ^X into the turret. The sky showed above, about the size of an orange. The turret had once had a spiral staircase but the central core had been broken down after the Cromwellian siege; only an edging of stones remained on the walls. This edging did not become continuous until about the second spiral. We struck matches and I started up. The colonel [redacted] swore and sweated, but followed. I showed him the trick of getting over the worst gap in the stones, which was too wide to bridge with one's stride, by crouching, throwing one's body forward and catching the next stone with one's hands; a scramble and he was there. The airman and my brother remained below. I was glad when we reached the second spiral. We climbed ^{perhaps} a hundred ^{and twenty} feet to the top. [redacted]

[redacted]

[redacted] ^{when we were safely down again most of} the whisky was gone. So I said, "Now let's ^{visit} the Concert party." I had ^{heard} the ^{audience} dispersing, from the top of the turret. We visited the artistes. [redacted]

[redacted] ^{The colonel} was most courteous to the women, especially the blonde soprano, but he took a great dislike to the tenor, a Welshman, and told him that he was no bloody good as a singer. He cross-examined him on his military service and was delighted to find that he had been for some reason or other exempted. He called him a louse and a bloody skrimshanker and a lot more until the blonde soprano, who was his wife, came to the rescue and threatened to chuck the colonel out. He went out grinning, kissing his hand to the soprano and telling the tenor to kiss the place where he wore no hat. The tenor turned courageous and shouted out something about reading the scriptures and how morally unjustifiable it was to fight. We all laughed till we wheezed. Then the colonel said we must get a drink; he knocked up a hotel barman and even got inside the bar, but the barman ~~refused to serve him~~ ^{refused to serve him} and threatened to call the police. The colonel did not raid the shelves as he would have done half an hour before when the whisky was fiercer in him; he merely told the barman what he thought of the Welsh, broke a glass or two and walked out. "Let's go home and have some more bridge."

He walked arm in arm with me down the hill and confided as one family man to another that his nerves were all in pieces because his missus was in the family way. That ~~was~~ ^{was} why he had broken up the bridge party. He had wanted her to have a good sleep. "If we go back quietly now, she'll not wake up; we can bid in whispers." So we went back and he drank silently and the airman drank silently and we played silently. I had three or four glasses myself; my brother abstained. We stopped at three-thirty in the morning. The colonel paid up and went to sleep on the sofa. I was eighteen shillings and my brother twelve shillings up at sixpence a ~~hundred~~ ^{hundred}. I was sick and shaking for weeks after this.

In March the second baby was born and we called him David. My mother was overjoyed. It was the first Graves grandson; my elder brothers had only had girls; here ^{at last} was ~~an~~ ^{an} ~~the Graves family silver and documents.~~ ^{the Graves family silver and documents.} When Jenny was born my mother had condoled with Nancy. ~~Perhaps~~ ^{Perhaps} "Perhaps it is as well to have a girl first to practise on." Nancy had from the first decided to have four children; they were to be like the children in her drawings and were to be girl, boy, girl, boy, in that order. She was going to get it all over quickly; she believed in young parents and families of three or four children fairly close together in age. She had the children in the order she intended and they were all like her drawings. She began to regret our marriage, as I also did. We wanted somehow to be dis-married - not by divorce, ^{which was as bad as a marriage} [REDACTED]

[REDACTED] - and able to live together without any legal or religious obligation to live together. It was about this time that I met Dick again, for the last time; ^{I found him ~~very~~ pleasant}

[REDACTED] and disagreeable. He was at the University, about to enter the diplomatic service, and had changed so much that it ^{seemed} absurd to ^{have ever} recall that I had suffered ^{on his account} [REDACTED]. Yet the caricature likeness remained. [REDACTED].

[REDACTED]

[REDACTED]

[REDACTED]

[REDACTED]

CHAPTER XXV.

I met T. E. Lawrence first at a guest night at All Souls'. Lawrence had just been given a college fellowship and it was the first time for many years that he had worn evening dress. The restlessness of his eyes was the first thing about him I noticed. He told me that he had read my poems in Egypt during one of his flying visits from Arabia; he and my brother Philip had been together in the Intelligence Department at Cairo, before his part in the Arab Revolt had begun, working out the Turkish Order of Battle. I knew nothing about his organisation of the Arab Revolt, his exploits and sufferings in the desert and his final entry into Damascus. He was merely, to me, a fellow-soldier who had come back to Oxford for a rest after the war. But I felt a sudden extraordinary sympathy with him. Later, when I was told that everyone was fascinated by Lawrence, I tried to dismiss this feeling as extravagant. ^{but it remained.} Between lectures at Oxford I often now visited Lawrence at All Souls'. Though he never drank himself, he used always to send his scout for a silver goblet of audit ale for me. Audit ale was brewed in the college; it was as soft as barley water ^{but} of great strength. (A prince once came down to Oxford to open a new museum and lunched at All Souls' before the ceremony; the mildness of the audit ale deceived him; he took it for lager, and he had to be taken back to the station in a cab with the blinds drawn.) Nancy and I lunched in Lawrence's rooms once with Vachel Lindsay the American poet and his mother. Mrs. Lindsay was from Springfield, Illinois, and, like her son, a prominent member of the Illinois Anti-Saloon League. When Lawrence told his scout that Mr. Lindsay though a poet was an Anti-Saloon Leaguer, he was scandalised and asked Lawrence's permission to lay on Lindsay's place a copy of verses composed ^{in 1861} by a [redacted] fellow of the College. One stanza was :

"The poet divine that cannot reach wine,
Because that his money doth many times faile,
Will hit on the vein to make a good strain,
If he be but inspired with a pot of good ale."

Mrs. Lindsay had been warned by friends to comment on nothing unusual that she met at Oxford. The College gold service ^{Lawrence} had [redacted] brought out in her honour and she took it to be the ^{ordinary} thing at a University luncheon-party.

^{His} [redacted] rooms were dark and oak-panelled. ^{A large} [redacted] table and a desk were the ^{principal} furniture. And there were two heavy leather chairs, ^{simply acquired} An American oil-financier had come in suddenly one day when I was ^{visiting T.E.} [redacted] and said: "I am here from the States, Colonel Lawrence, to ask you a single question. You are the only man who will answer it honestly. Do middle-eastern conditions justify my putting any money in (Mesopotamian) oil?" Lawrence without rising simply answered: "No." "That's ~~was~~ all I wanted to know; it was worth coming for that. Thank you, and good day!" In his brief glance about the room he had found something missing [redacted]; on his way home through London he chose the chairs and had them sent to Lawrence with his card. Other things in the room were pictures, including Augustus John's portrait of Feisal which Lawrence, I believe, bought from John with the diamond which he had worn as a mark of honour in his Arab head-dress; his books, including a Kelmscott Chaucer; three prayer-rugs, the gift of Arab leaders who ^{had} fought with him, one of them with the sheen on the nap made with crushed lapis-lazuli; a station-bell from the Hejaz railway; and on the mantelpiece a that Mr. Lindsay thought a poet was an Anti-Saloon League, he was scandalized and asked Lawrence's permission to lay on Lindsay's place a copy of verses composed by a fellow of the College. One stanza was :

Hejaz

"The poet divine who cannot drink wine
Because that his purse both oftentimes fail
Will use the less course and write better verses
If he warm up his heart with a pot of old ale."

Mrs. Lindsay had been warned by friends to comment on nothing unusual that she met at Oxford. The College gold service had brought out in her honour and she took it to be the thing at a University luncheon-party. rooms were dark and oak-panelled. table and a desk were the furniture. And there were two heavy leather chairs. An American oil-financier had come in suddenly one day when I was and said, "I am here from the States, Colonel Lawrence, to ask you a single question. You are the only man who will answer it honestly. Do middle-eastern conditions justify my putting any money in Mesopotamia, oil?" Lawrence without raising simply answered: "No." "That is all I want to know; it was worth coming for that. Thank you, and good day!" In his brief glance about the room he had found something missing on his way home through London he chose the chairs and had them sent to Lawrence with his card. Other things in the room were pictures, including Augustus John's portrait of Beal which Lawrence bought from John with the diamond which he had worn as a mark of honour in his Arab head-dress; his books, including a Kilmacott Changer; three prayer-rugs, the gift of Arab leaders who fought with him, one of them with the sheen on the nap made with crushed lapis-lazuli; a station-bell from the Hejaz railway; and on the mantelpiece a four-thousand-year old toy, a clay soldier on horseback from a child's grave at Carchemish where Lawrence was digging before the war.

[Handwritten signature]

[Handwritten mark]

We talked ^{mostly} about poetry. I was working at a book of poems which appeared later under the title of The Pier-Glass; they were poems that reflected my haunted condition. The Country Sentiment mood was breaking down. Lawrence ~~made a~~ ^{made a} ~~number of suggestions~~ ^{number of suggestions for improving these poems and I adopted most of them}

^{no part} ~~He~~ ^{He} told me of two or three of his schemes for brightening ^{All Souls and generally} Oxford. One was for improving the turf in the quadrangle which he said was in a disgraceful condition, nearly rotting away; he had suggested at a college meeting that it should be manured or treated in some other way but no action ^{had been} ~~was~~ taken. He ^{now} said that he was going to plant mushrooms on it so that they would have to re-turf it altogether. He consulted a mushroom expert in town, but found that it was difficult to make spawn grow. He would have persisted if he had not been called away about this time to ^{help} ~~Winston Churchill~~ with the Middle-Eastern settlement. Another scheme, in which I was to have helped, was to steal the Magdalen College deer. He was going to drive them into the small inner quadrangle of All Souls', ~~when Magdalen protested and asked for its deer back,~~ ^{had} ~~persuaded~~ ^{ing} the college to reply that it was the All Souls' herd and had been pastured there from time immemorial. Great things were expected of this raid. ~~It~~ ^{It} fell through for the same reason as the other. But a successful strike of college-servants for better pay and hours was said to have been engineered by Lawrence.

I took no part in undergraduate life; seldom visiting my college except to draw my Government grant and Exhibition money; I refused to pay the college games' subscription, having little interest in St. John's and being unfit for games myself. Most of my friends were at Balliol and Queen's, and in any case Wadham had a prior claim on my loyalty. I spent as little time as ^{possible} away from Boar's Hill. At this time I had little to do with the children; they were in the hands of Nancy and the nurse, ^{the} nurse now also did the cooking and housework for us. Nancy felt that she wanted some activity besides drawing, though she could not decide what. One evening in the middle of the long vacation she suddenly said, "I must get away somewhere out of this for a change. Let's go off on bicycles somewhere." We packed a few things and rode off in the general direction of Devonshire. The nights were ~~so~~ cold ^{ish} and we had not brought blankets. We found that the best way was to bicycle by night and sleep by day. We went over Salisbury Plain past several deserted army camps; they ^{had a ghostly} ~~look~~ ^{look}. There was accommodation in these camps for a million men, the number of men killed in the Imperial Forces during the war. We found ourselves near Dorchester, so we turned in there to visit Thomas Hardy whom we had met not long before when he came up to Oxford to get his honorary doctor's degree. We found him active and gay, with none of the aphasia and wandering of attention that we had noticed in him at Oxford.

I wrote out a record of the conversation ^{I had with him} ~~with him~~ it. He welcomed us as representatives of the post-war generation. He said that he lived such a quiet life at Dorchester that he feared he was ^{altogether} ~~quite~~ behind the times. He wanted, for instance, to know whether we had any sympathy with the Bolshevik regime, and whether he could trust the Morning Post's accounts of the Red Terror. Then he was interested in Nancy's hair, which she wore short, in advance of the fashion, and in her keeping her own name. His comment on the name question was ^x "Why, you are old-fashioned. I knew an old couple here sixty years ago that did the same. The woman was called Nanny Priddle (descendant of an ancient family, the Paradelles, long decayed into peasantry), and she would never change her name either." Then he wanted to know why I no longer used my army rank. I said that it was because I was no longer ~~a~~ soldier. ^{ing} "But you have a right to it; I would certainly keep my rank if I had one. I should be very proud to be called Captain Hardy."

He told us that he was now engaged in restoring a Norman font in a church nearby. He only had the bowl to work upon, but enjoyed doing a bit of his old work again. Nancy mentioned that we had not baptised our children. He was interested, but not scandalised, remarking that his old mother had always said of baptism that at any rate there was no harm in it, and that she would not like her children to blame her in after-life for leaving any duty to them undone. "I have ^{usually} found that what my old mother said was right." He said that ^{to his mind} ~~the~~ new generation of ^{contained} ~~clergymen~~ very much better men than the last... Though he now only went to church three times a year - one visit to each of the three neighbouring churches - he could not forget that the church was in the old days the centre ~~for~~ ~~of~~ of all the musical, literary, and artistic education in the country village. He talked about the old string orchestras in Wessex churches, in one of which his father, grandfather ^x and he himself had taken part; he regretted their disappearance. He told us that the clergyman who appears as old St. Clair in Tess of the D'Uberilles was the man who protested to the War Office about the Sunday brass-band performances at the Dorchester Barracks, and was the cause of Headquarters no longer being sent to this once very popular station.

We had tea in the drawing-room, which, like the rest of the house was crowded with furniture and ornaments. Hardy had an affection for old possessions, and Mrs. Hardy was too fond to suggest that anything at all should be removed. Hardy, ~~with~~ his cup of tea, ^{in hand} began making jokes about bishops at the Athenaeum Club and imitating their episcopal tones when they ordered "China tea and a little bread and butter (yes, my lord!)." Apparently he considered bishops were fair game. He was soon censuring Sir Edmund Gosse, who had recently stayed with them, for a breach of good taste in imitating his old friend Henry James eating soup. Loyalty to his friends was always a passion with Hardy.

After tea we went into the garden, and Hardy asked to see some of my recent poems. I showed him one, and he asked if he might make some suggestions. He objected to the phrase the "~~scent~~ ^{scent} of thyme," which he said was one of the clichés which the poets of his generation studied to avoid. I replied that they had avoided it so well that it could be used again now without offence, and he withdrew the objection. He asked whether I wrote easily, and I said that this poem was in its sixth draft and would probably be finished in two more. "Why!" he said, "I have never in my life taken more than three, or perhaps four, drafts for a poem. I am afraid of it losing its freshness." He said that he had been able to sit down and write novels by time-table, but that poetry was always accidental, and perhaps it was for that reason that he prized it more highly.

He spoke disparagingly of his novels though admitting that there were chapters in them that he had enjoyed writing. We were walking round the garden, and Hardy paused at a spot near the green-house. He said that [redacted] he had once been pruning a tree when [redacted] ^{here} had suddenly come into his head [redacted] ^{an idea} for ^{a story,} the best story that he had ever thought of. It came complete with characters, setting, even some of the dial^{ogue} [redacted]. But as he had no pencil and paper with him, and was anxious to finish pruning the tree before it rained, he had let it go. By the time he sat down to recall it, all was utterly gone. "Always carry a pencil and paper," he said. He added, "Of course, even if I could remember that story now, I couldn't write it. I am past novel-writing. But I often wonder what it was."

At dinner that night he grew enthusiastic in praise of cider, which he had drunk since a boy [redacted] ^{and which, he said,} was the finest medicine he knew. I suggested that in the Message to the American People which he had been asked to write he might take the opportunity of recommending cider.

He began complaining of autograph-hunters and their persistence. He disliked leaving letters unanswered, particularly [redacted] ^{since} if he did not write these people pestered him the more; he had been upset that morning by a letter from an autograph-fiend which began, -

Dear Mr. Hardy, - I am interested to know why the devil you don't reply to my request

He asked me for my advice, and was grateful for the suggestion that a mythical secretary should reply offering his autograph at one or two guineas, the amount to be sent to a hospital ("Swanage Children's Hospital," put in Hardy), which would forward a receipt.

He said that he regarded professional critics as parasites no less noxious than autograph-hunters, and wished the world rid of them. He also wished that he had not listened to them when he was a young man; on their advice he had cut out dialect-words from his early poems though spot near the green-house. He said that he had once been pruning a tree when ^{on this} had suddenly come into his head ^{the story} for the best story that he had ever thought of.

 It came complete with characters, setting, even some of the dial ^{copy}. But as he had no pencil and paper with him, and was anxious to finish pruning the tree before it rained, he had let it go. By the time he sat down to recall it, all was utterly gone. "Always carry a pencil and paper," he said. He added, "Of course, even if I could remember that story now, I couldn't write it. I am past novel-writing.
 But I often wonder what it was."

At dinner that night he grew enthusiastic in praise of cider, which he had drunk since a boy ^{and which, I think, was the finest} medicine he knew. I suggested that in the Message to the American People which he had been asked to write he might take the opportunity of recommending cider.
 He began complaining of autograph-hunters and their persistence. He disliked leaving letters unanswered, particularly if he did not write these people pestered him the more; he had been upset that morning by a letter from an autograph-friend which began -

Dear Mr. Hardy, - I am interested to know why the devil you don't reply to my request . . .

He asked me for my advice, and was grateful for the suggestion that a mythical secretary should reply offering his autograph at one or two guineas, the amount to be sent to a hospital ("Swanage Children's Hospital," put in Hardy), which would forward a receipt.

He said that he regarded professional critics as parasites no less noxious than autograph-hunters, and wished the world rid of them. He also wished that he had not listened to them when he was a young man; on their advice he had cut out dialect-words from his early poems though they had no exact synonyms to fit the context. And still the critics ^{still} plagued him. One of them recently complained of a poem of his where he had written "his shape smalled in the distance." Now what in the world else could he have written? Hardy then laughed a little, and said that once or twice recently he had looked up a word in the dictionary for fear of being again accused of coining, and had found it there right enough - only to read on and find that the sole authority quoted was himself in a half-forgotten novel! He talked of early literary influences, and said that he had none at all, for he did not come of literary stock. Then he corrected himself and said that a friend, a fellow-apprentice in the architect's office where he worked as a young man, used to lend him books. (His taste in literature was certainly most unexpected. ~~_____~~ Lawrence ^{once}, when ~~_____~~ had ventured to say something slightly disparaging ^{of} against Homer's Iliad, ^{he} protest^{ed}: "Oh, but I admire the Iliad greatly. [It reminds me of Scott's Marmion."] Lawrence could not at first believe that Hardy was not making a little joke.)

We went off the next day, but there was ~~_____~~ more talk at breakfast before we went. Hardy was at the critics again. He was complaining that they accused him of pessimism. One man had recently singled out as an example of gloom a poem he had written about a woman whose house was burned down on her wedding night. "Of course it is a humorous piece," said Hardy, "and the man must have been thick-witted not to see that. When I read his criticism I went through my last collection of poems with a pencil, marking them S, N, and C, according as they were sad, neutral, or cheerful. I found them as nearly as possible in equal proportions; which nobody could call pessimism." In his opinion ~~_____~~ ^{vers libre} could come to nothing in England. "All we can do is to write on the old themes in the old styles, but try to do a little better than those who went before us." About his own poems he said that once they were written he cared very little what happened to them.

He told us of his work during the war, and said that he was glad to have been chairman of the Anti-Profiteering Committee, and to have succeeded in bringing a number of rascally Dorchester tradesmen to book. "It made me unpopular, of course," he said, "but it was a hundred times better than sitting on a military tribunal and sending young men to the war who did not want to go."

This was the last time we saw Hardy, though we had a standing invitation to come to visit him.

From Dorchester we bicycled to Tiverton in Devonshire where Nancy's old nurse kept a fancy-goods shop. Nancy helped her dress the shop-window and advised her about framing the prints that she was selling. She also gave the shop a good turn-out, dusted the stock, and took her turn behind the counter. As a result of Nancy's work the week's receipts went up several shillings and continued at the improved figure for a week or two after we were gone. This gave Nancy the idea of starting a shop herself on Boar's Hill. It was a large residential district with no shop nearer than three miles away. She said that we ^{should} buy a second-hand army hut, stock it with confectionery, groceries, tobacco, hardware, medicines, and all the other things that one finds in a village shop, run it tidily and economically and make our fortune. I undertook to help her while the vacation lasted and ^{became} quite excited about the idea myself. She decided to take a neighbour, the Hon. Mrs. Michael Howard, into partnership. Neither Nancy nor Mrs. Howard had any experience of shop-management or commercial book-keeping. But Mrs. Howard undertook to keep the books while Nancy did most of the other work. Nancy was anxious to start the shop six weeks after the original decision, but army-huts were not obtainable at any reasonable price (the timber-merchants were in a ring), so it was decided to employ a local carpenter to build a shop to Nancy's design. A neighbour rented us a corner of his field close to the Masefields' house. The work was finished in time and the stock bought. The Daily Mirror advertised the opening on its front page with the heading "SHOP KEEPING ON PARNASSUS" and crowds came up from Oxford to look at us. We soon realised that it (either had) to be a big general shop which made Boar's Hill more or less independent of Oxford (and of the unsatisfactory system of vans calling at the door and bringing stuff of inferior quality with 'take it or leave it'); or it had to be a small sweet and tobacco shop making no challenge to the Oxford tradesmen. We decided on the challenge. The building had to be enlarged and two or three hundred pounds' worth of stock purchased. Mrs. Howard was not able to give much of her time to the work, having children to look after and no nurse; most of it fell on Nancy and myself. I used to serve in the shop several hours of the day while she went round to the big houses for the daily orders. The term had now begun and I was supposed to be attending lectures in Oxford. Another caricature scene: - Myself, wearing a green baize apron this time, with flushed face and disordered hair, selling a packet of Bird's Eye tobacco to the Poet Laureate with one hand and with the other weighing out half a pound of brown sugar for Sir Arthur Evans' gardener's wife.

The gross weekly takings were now ^{£60} ~~sixty~~ pounds a week and Nancy, though she had given up her drawing, still had the house and children to ~~some~~^{wander}. We had no car and constant emergency bicycle-rides had to be made to Oxford to get new stock from the wholesalers; we made a point of always being able to supply whatever was asked for. We engaged a shop-boy to call for orders, but the work was still too heavy. Mrs. Howard went out of partnership and Nancy and I found great difficulty in understanding her accounts. I was fairly good at conventional book-keeping; the keeping of company accounts had been part of my lecture-syllabus when I was instructing cadets. But that did not help me ~~at all~~^{with these, which were on a novel system.}

The shop business finally ousted everything, not only Nancy's painting but my writing, my university work, and Nancy's proper supervision of the house and children. We now had the custom of every house on Boar's Hill but two or three. One of those ~~whom~~^{which} we courted unsuccessfully was Mrs. Masfield's. The proximity of the shop to her house did not please her. And her housekeeper, she said, preferred to deal with a provision merchant in Oxford and she could not over-ride this arrangement. However, to show that there was no ill-feeling, she used to come once a week to the shop and buy a tin of Vim and a packet of Lux, for which she paid ~~down~~^{money} from a ~~cash~~ cash-box which she carried with her. The moral problems of trade interested me, Nancy and I both found that it was very difficult at this time of fluctuating prices to be really honest; we could not resist the temptation of undercharging the poor villagers of Wootton, who were frequent customers, and recovering ~~it~~^{our money} from the richer residents. Playing at Robin Hood came easily to me. Nobody ever caught us out; it was as easy as shelling peas, the shop-boy said, who also took his turn behind the counter. We found that most people bought tea by price and not by quality. If we happened to be out of the tea selling at ninepence a quarter which Mrs. So-and-So always ^{bought} ~~refused~~, refusing the eightpenny tea, and Mrs. So-and-So asked for it in a hurry, the only thing to do was to make up a pound of the sevenpenny, which was the same colour as the ninepenny, and charge it at ninepence; the difference would not be noticed. We were sorry for the commercial travellers who came sweating up the hill with their heavy bags of samples, usually on foot, and had to be sent away without any orders. They would pitch a hard-luck tale and often we would relent and get in more stock than we needed. In gratitude they would tell us some of the tricks of the trade; advising us, for instance, never to cut cheese or bacon exactly to weight but to make it an ounce or two more and over-charge for this extra piece. "There's few can do the sum before you take the stuff off the scales and there's fewer still ^{who} will take the trouble to weigh up again when they get back home."

The shop lasted six months. Nancy suddenly dismissed the nurse. Nancy had always practised the most up-to-date methods of training and feeding children, and the nurse, over-devoted to the children, had ^{recently} disobeyed her instructions. Nancy put the children before anything. ^{she} ~~she~~ decided that there was nothing to be done but to take ~~them~~ ^{them} and the house ^{over} herself, and to find a manager for the shop. At this point I caught influenza and took a long time to recover from it.

War-horror overcame me again. The political situation in Europe seemed to be going from bad to worse. There was already trouble in Ireland, Russia and the Near East. The papers promised new and deadlier poison-gases for the next war. There was a rumour that Lord Berkeley's house on Boar's Hill was to become an experimental laboratory for making them. I had bad nights. I thought that perhaps I owed it to Nancy

✓ to go to a psychi^hatrist to be cured; yet I was not sure. Somehow I thought that the power of writing poetry, which was more important to me than anything else I did, would disappear if I allowed myself to get cured; my Pier-Glass haunting would end and I would become merely a dull easy writer. It seemed to me less important to be well than to be a good poet. I also had a strong resistance against allowing anyone to have the power over me that psych-iatrists always seemed to win over their patients. I had always refused to allow myself to be hypnotised by anyone in any way.

I decided ~~to~~ see as few people as possible, ^{stop all} ~~to~~

~~to~~ ^{outside work and} ~~to~~ cure myself. I would read the modern psychological books and apply them to my case. I had learned already the rudiments of morbid psychology from talks with Rivers, ^{his colleague} and from Dr. Henry Head, the neurologist, under whose care Robert Nichols had been. I liked Head's scientific integrity. Once when he was testing a man whom he suspected of homicidal mania he had made some suggestion to him which came within the danger-area of his insanity; the man picked up a heavy knife from the consulting table and rushed threateningly at Head. Head, ^{and} dodging round the table, ~~to~~ not at all quick on his legs, exclaimed, "Typical, typical! Capital, capital!" and, only as an afterthought, "Help! Help!" He had great knowledge of the geography of the brain and the peculiar delusions and maladjustments that followed lesions in the different parts. He told me, at different times, exactly what was wrong with Mr. Jingle in Pickwick Papers, why some otherwise literate people found it impossible to spell, and why some others saw ghosts standing by their bedside. He said about the bedside ghosts, "They always come to the same side of the bed and if you turn the bed round you turn the ghost round with it. They come to the contrary side of the lesion."

A manager [redacted] was found for the shop. But as soon as it was known that Nancy and I were no longer behind the counter the weekly receipts immediately began to fall; they were soon down to twenty pounds, and still falling. The manager [redacted]'s salary was more than our profits. Prices were now falling too at the rate of about five per cent every week, so that the stock on our shelves had depreciated greatly in value. And we had let ^{one or two} [redacted] of the Wootton villagers run up bad debts. When we came to reckon things up we realised that it was wisest to cut our losses and sell out. We hoped to recoup our original expenditure and even to be in pocket on the whole transaction by selling the shop and the goodwill to a big firm of Oxford grocers that wished to buy it as a branch establishment. Unfortunately the site was not ours [redacted] and the landlord [redacted] was prevailed upon by an interested neighbour not to let any ordinary business firm take over the shop from us and spoil the local amenities. No other site was available, ^s so there was nothing to do but sell off what stock remained at bankrupt prices to the wholesalers and find a buyer for the building. Unfortunately, again, the building was not made in sections bolted [redacted] and could not be sold to be put up again elsewhere; its only value was as timber, and in these six months the corner in timber had also been broken and the prices fallen to very little. We recovered twenty pounds of the two hundred that had been spent on it. Nancy and I were so disgusted that we decided to leave Boar's Hill. We were about five hundred pounds in debt to the wholesalers and others. A lawyer took the whole ^{matter} [redacted] in hand, disposed of our assets for us, and the debt was finally reduced to about three hundred pounds. Nancy's father sent her a hundred-pound note (in a match-box) as his contribution, and the remainder was unexpectedly contributed by Lawrence. He gave me four chapters of Seven Pillars of Wisdom, his ^{history} of the Arab Revolt, to sell for serial publication in the United States. It was a point of honour with him not to make any money out of the Revolt even in the most indirect way, but if it could help a poet in difficulties, there seemed no harm in that.

^{We} gave ^{the} Masfield's notice ^{that we were leaving} the cottage at the end of the June quarter, 1921. We had no idea where we were going or what we were going to do. We decided that we must get another cottage somewhere and live very quietly, looking after the children ourselves, and that we must try to make what money we needed by writing and drawing. Nancy, who had taken charge of everything when I was ill, now gave me the task of finding a cottage. It had to be found in about three weeks' time. I said, "But you know that there are no cottages anywhere to be had." She said, "I know, but we are going to get one." I said ironically, "Describe it in detail; since there are no cottages we might as well have a no-cottage that we really like." She said: "Well, it must have six rooms, water in the house, a beamed attic, a walled-in garden, and it must be near the river. It must be in a village with shops and yet a little removed from the village. The village must be five or six miles from Oxford in the opposite direction from Boar's Hill. The church must have a tower and not a spire. And we can only afford ten shillings a week unfurnished." There were other details that I took down about soil, sanitation, windows, stairs, and kitchen sinks and then I went off on my bicycle. I had first drawn a ruler across the Oxford ordnance-map and found four or five villages that corresponded in general direction and distance and were on the river. By enquiry I found that two had shops; that of these two one had a towered church and the other a spired church. I therefore went to a firm of house-agents in Oxford and said, "Have you any cottages to let unfurnished?" The house-agent laughed politely. So I said, "What I want is a cottage at Islip with a walled garden, six rooms, water in the house, just outside the village, with a beamed attic and rent ten shillings a week." The house-agent said, "Oh, you mean the World's End Cottage? But that is for sale, not for renting. It has failed to find a purchaser for two years, and I think that the owner will let it go now at five hundred pounds, which is only half what he originally asked." So I went back and next day Nancy came with me; she looked round and said, "Yes, this is the cottage all right, but I shall have to cut down those cypress trees and change those window-panes. We'll move in on quarter-day." I said, "But the money! We haven't the money." Nancy answered, "If we could find the exact house, surely to goodness we can find a mere lump sum of money." She was right, for my mother was good enough to buy the cottage and rent it to us at the rate of ten shillings a week.

Islip was a name of good omen to me, ~~because~~ it was associated with Abbot Islip, a poor boy of the village who had become Abbot of Westminster and befriended John Skelton when he took sanctuary in the Abbey from the anger of Wolsey. I had come more and more to associate myself with Skelton, discovering a curious affinity. Whenever I wanted a motto for a new book I always found exactly the right one somewhere or other in Skelton's poems. We moved into the Islip cottage and a new chapter started. I did not sit for my finals.

CHAPTER XXVI.

We were at Islip from 1921 until 1925. My mother in renting us the house had put a clause in the agreement that it was to be used only as a residence and not for the carrying on of any trade or business. She wanted to guard against any further commercial enterprise on our part; she need not have worried. Islip was an agricultural village, and far enough from Oxford not to be contaminated with the roguery for which the outskirts of a University town are usually well-known. The village policeman led an easy life. During the whole time we were living there we never had a thing stolen or ever had a complaint to make against ~~Islip~~ ^{a native cottager} ~~Islip~~. Once by mistake I left my bicycle at the station for two days and, when I recovered, it not only were both lamps, the pump, and the repair outfit still in place, but an anonymous friend had even cleaned it.

Every Saturday in the winter months, ~~so~~ ^{as} long as I was at Islip, I played football for the village team. There had been no football in Islip for some eighty years; the ex-soldiers had reintroduced it. The village nonogenarian complained that the game was not what it had been when he was a boy; he called it unmanly. He pointed across the fields to two aged willow trees. "They used to be our home goals," he said. "T'other pair was half a mile upstream. Constable stopped our play in the end. Three men were killed in one game; one was kicked to death, t'other two drowned each other in a scrimmage. Her was a grand game." Islip football, though not unmanly, was ladylike by comparison with the game as I had played it at Charterhouse. When playing centre-forward I was often booed now for charging the goal-keeper while he was fumbling with the shot he had saved. The cheers were reserved for my inside-left, who spent most of his time stylishly dribbling the ball in circles round and round the field until he was robbed; he seldom went anywhere near the goal-mouth. The football club was democratic. The cricket club was not. I played cricket the first season but left the club because the selection of the team was not always a selection of the best eleven men; regular players would be dropped to make room for visitors to the village who were friends of the club-secretary.

At first we had so little money that we did all the work in the house ourselves, including the washing. I did the cooking, Nancy did the mending and making the childrens' clothes; we shared the rest of the work. Later money improved: we found it more economical to send the washing out and get a neighbour in to do some of the heavier cleaning and scrubbing. In our last year at Islip we even had a decrepit car which Nancy drove. My part was to wind it up; the energy that I put into winding was almost equivalent to pushing it for a mile or two. The friends who gave it to us told us that its name was 'Dr. Marie', and when we asked "why?" we were told, "because it's all right in theory." One day when Nancy was driving down Foxcombe Hill, the steepest hill near Oxford, there was a slight jar. Nancy thought it advisable to stop; when we got out we found that there were only three wheels on the car. The other, with part of the axle, was retrieved nearly a mile back.

These four years I spent chiefly on housework and being nurse to the children. Catherine was born in 1922 and Sam in 1924. By the end of 1925 we had lived for eight successive years in an atmosphere of teething, minor accidents, epidemics and perpetual washing of childrens' napkins. I did not dislike this sort of life except ^{for} the money difficulties. I liked ^{my life} ~~being~~ with the children. But the strain told on Nancy. She was constantly ill, and often I had to take charge of everything. She tried occasionally to draw; but by the time she had got her materials ^{together} ~~some~~ some alarm from the nursery would always disturb her. She said at last that she would not start again until all the children were house-trained and old enough for school. I kept on writing because the responsibility for making money rested chiefly on me and because nothing has ever stopped me writing when I have had something to write. We kept the cottage cleaned and polished in a routine that left us little time for anything else. We had accumulated a number of brass ornaments and utensils and allowed them to become a tyranny, and our children wore five times as many clean dresses as our neighbours' children did. PI found that I had the faculty of working through constant interruptions. I could recognise the principal varieties of babies' screams - hunger, indigestion, wetness, pins, temper, boredom, wanting to be played with - and learned to disregard all but the more important ones. But most of the books that I wrote in these years betray the conditions under which I worked; they are scrappy, not properly considered and obviously written out of reach of a proper reference-library. Only poetry did not suffer. When I was working at a poem nothing else mattered; I went on doing my mechanical tasks in a trance until I had time to sit down to write it out. At one period I only allowed myself half an hour's writing a day, but once I did write I always had too much to put down;

I never sat chewing my pen. My poetry writing has always been a painful process of continual corrections and corrections on top of corrections and persistent dissatisfaction. I have never written a poem in less than three drafts; the greatest number I recall is thirty-five. The average at this time was eight; it is now five or six.

The children were all healthy and gave us little trouble. Nancy had strong views about giving them no meat or tea, putting them to bed early, making them rest in the afternoon and giving them as much fruit as they wanted. We did our best to keep them from the mistakes of our own childhood. But it was impossible for them when they went to the village school to avoid formal religion, class snobbery, political prejudice, and mystifying fairy stories about the facts of sex. I never felt any possessive feeling about them as Nancy did. To me they were close friends with the claims of friendship and liable to the accidents of friendship. We both made a point of punishing them in a disciplinary way as little as possible. If we lost our temper with them it was a different matter. Islip was as good a place as any for the happy childhood that we wanted to give them. The river was close and we had the loan of a canoe. There were fields to play about in, and animals, and plenty of children of their own age. They liked school.

After so much shifting about during the war I disliked leaving home, except to visit some well-ordered house where I could expect reasonable comfort. But Nancy was always proposing sudden 'bursts for freedom' and I used to come with her ^{and} usually enjoy them. In 1922 we used a derelict baker's van for a caravan ride down to the south coast. We had three children with us, Catherine as a four-months old baby. It rained every single day for the month we were away -- and the problem of washing and drying the baby's napkins whenever we camped for the night -- and the problem of finding a farmer who ^{and would be} was willing to let us pull into his field ~~and~~ would not mistake us for gypsies) -- and then the shaft that twice dropped off when we were on hills -- and twice the back of the cart flew open and a child fell out on the road -- and the difficulty of getting oats for the horse (which had been five years on grass as being too old for work) on country-roads organized for motor traffic -- and cooking to be done in the open with usually a high wind and always rain and the primus-stove sputtering and flaring up. It was near Lewes that we drew up on a strip of public land alongside the horse-and-van of a Mr. Hicks, a travelling showman from Brighton. He told us many tricks of the road and also the story of his life: "Yes, I saw the Reverend Powers, Cantab. of Rodmell last week, and he, knowing my history, said, 'Well, Mr. Hicks, I suppose that in addressing you I should be right in putting the letters B.A. after your name?' I said, 'I have the right to it certainly, but when a man's down, you know how it is, he does not like attaching a handle to his name.' For you must know, I was once a master at Ardingly College."

"Indeed, Mr. Hicks, and where were you B.A.?"

"Didn't I just tell you, at Ardingly? I won a scholarship at the beginning and they gave me the choice of going to Oxford or Winchester or Cambridge or Eton. And I chose Winchester. But I was only there a twelvemonth. No, I couldn't stand it any longer owing to the disgraceful corruption of the junior clergy and the undergraduates - you understand of course. I rub up a bit of the classic now and then, but I like to forget those times. The other day, though, me and a young Jew boy who had cleaned up B75 at the race-meeting with photographing and one thing and another, had a fine lark. .I got out two old mortar-boards and a couple of gowns from the box in the van where I keep them and you should have seen us swaggering down Brighton Pier, my boy." A few days later we stopped at a large mansion in Hampshire, rented by Sir Lionel Philips, the South African financier, whom Nancy knew. I found myself in an argument with him about socialist economics and he told me a story which I liked even better than Mr. Hicks'. "I visited Kimberley recently and realised what a deep hole I had made. Where, as a young man, I tore the first turf off with my bare hands, they were now mining down half a mile."

In the end we got back safely.

I was so busy that I had no time to be ill myself. Nancy ^{begged me not to} ~~was not to~~ talk about the war in ^{her hearing} ~~the house~~ and I was ready to forget about it. The villagers called me "The Captain," otherwise I had few reminders except my yearly visit to the standing medical board. ^{The board} ~~It~~ continued for some years to recommend me for a disability pension. The particular disability was neurasthenia; the train journey and the army railway warrant filled out with my rank and regiment usually produced reminiscential neurasthenia by the time I reached the board. The award was at last made permanent at forty-two pounds a year. Ex-service men were continually coming to the door selling boot-laces and asking for cast-off shirts and socks. We always gave them a cup of tea and money. Islip was a convenient halt between the Chipping Norton and the Oxford workhouses. One day an out-of-work ex-service man, a steam-roller driver by trade, came calling with his three children, one of them a baby.

Their mother had recently died in childbirth. We felt very sorry for them and Nancy offered to adopt the eldest child, Daisy, who was about thirteen years old and her father's greatest anxiety. She undertook to train Daisy in housework so that she would be able later to go into service. ~~she~~ ^{Daisy} was still of school age. Her father shed tears of gratitude and Daisy seemed happy enough to be a member of the family. Nancy made her new clothes; we cleaned her, bought her shoes, and gave her a bedroom to herself. Daisy was not a success. She was a big ugly girl, strong as a horse and toughened by her three years on the roads. Her father was most anxious for her to continue her education, which had been interrupted by their wanderings. But Daisy hated school; she was put in the baby class and the girls of her own age used to tease her. In return she pulled their hair and thumped them, so they sent her to coventry. After a while she grew homesick for the ~~road~~ ^{road}. "That was a good life," she used to say. "Dad and me and my brother and the baby. The baby was a blessing. When I fetched him along to the back doors I nearly always won something. 'Course, I was artful. If they tried to slam the door in my face I used to put my foot in it and say, 'This is my little orphan brother.' Then I used to look round and anything I seen I used to ast for. I used to ast for a pram for the baby, if I seen an old one in a shed; and I'd get it, too. Of course we had a pram really, a good one, and then we'd sell the pram I'd won, in the next town we come to. Good beggars always ast for something particlar, something they seen lying about. It's no good asking for food or money. I used to pick up a lot for my Dad. I was a better beggar nor he was, he said. We used to go along together singing 'On the Road to Anywhere.'

And there were always the Spikes to go to when the weather was bad. The Spike at Chippy Norton was our winter home. They was very good to us there. We used to go to the movies once a week. The grub was good at Chippy Norton. We been all over the country, Wales and Devonshire, right up to Scotland, but we always come back to Chippy." Nancy and I were shocked one day when a tramp came to the door and Daisy slammed the door in his face and told him to clear out of it, Nosey, and not to poke his ugly mug into respectable people's houses. "I know you, Nosey Williams," she said, "you and your ex-service papers what you pinched from a bloke down in Salisbury, and the bigamy charge against you a-waiting down at Plymouth. Hop it now quick, or I'll run for the cop." Daisy told us the true histories of many of the beggars we had befriended. She said, "There's not one decent man in ten among them bums. My Dad's the only decent man of the lot. The reason most of them is on the road is, the cops have something against them, so they has to keep moving. Of course my Dad don't like the life; he took to it too late in life. And my mother was very respectable too. She kept us clean. Most of those bums is lousy, with nasty diseases, and they keeps out of the Spike as much as they can 'cause they don't like the carbolic baths." Daisy was with us for a whole winter. When the spring came and the roads dried her father called for her again. He couldn't manage the little ones without her, he said. That was the last we saw of Daisy, though she wrote to us once from Chipping Norton asking us for money.

My pension was our only certain source of income, neither of us having any private means of our own. The government grant and college exhibition had ended at the time we moved to Islip. ~~_____~~

I never made more at this time than about £30 a year from my poetry, anthology fees, and an occasional couple of guineas for poems contributed to periodicals. There was another £16 a year for the rent of the Harlech cottage and an odd guinea or two for reviewing. My volumes of poetry did not sell. Fairies and Fusiliers had gone into two editions because it was published in the war-years when people were reading poetry as they had not done for many years. The inclusion of my work in Edward Marsh's Georgian Poetry had made my name well-known, but after 1919 when the series ended it was forgotten again. Country Sentiment was hardly noticed; the Pier-Glass was also a failure. They were published by Martin Secker, not by Heinemann, who had published Fairies and Fusiliers.—William Heinemann, just before he died, had tried to teach me how poetry should be written and I resented it. These three books had been published in America where my name was known since John Masefield, Robert Nichols and finally Siegfried in 1920 had gone over to lecture about modern English poetry. But English poets slumped and it was eight years before another book of my poems could find a publisher in America. In these days I used to take the reviews of my poetry-books seriously. I reckoned their effect on sales and so on the grocery bills. I still believed that it was possible to write poetry that was true poetry and yet could reach, say, a three or four thousand copy sale. I expected some such success. I consorted with other poets and had a fellow-feeling for them. Beside Hardy, Siegfried, and the Boar's Hill residents, I knew Delamare, W. H. Davies, T. S. Eliot, the Sitwells and many more. I liked W. H. Davies because he was from South Wales and afraid of the dark, and because once ^{, I heard,} he made out a list of poets and crossed them off one by one as he decided that they were not true poets -- until only two names were left. I approved the final choice. Delamare I liked too. He was gentle and I could see how hard he worked at his poems. I was always interested in the writing-technique of my contemporaries. I once told him what hours of worry he must have had over the lines:

"Ah, no man knows
Through what wild centuries
Roves back the rose"

and how in the end he had been dissatisfied. He admitted that he had been forced to leave the assonance "Roves and rose" because no synonym for "roves" was strong enough. I seldom saw Osbert and Sacheverell Sitwell after the war-years. When I did I always felt uncomfortably rustic in their society. Once Osbert sent me a present of a brace of grouse. They came from his country-residence in Derbyshire in a bag labelled: "With Captain Sitwell's compliments to Captain Graves." Nancy and I could neither of us face the task of plucking and gutting and roasting the birds, so we gave them to a neighbour. I thanked Osbert: - "Captain Graves acknowledges with thanks Captain Sitwell's gift of Captain Grouse."

Our total income, counting birthday and Christmas cheques from relatives, was about £130 a year. As Nancy reminded me, this was about 50/- a week and there were farm labourers at Islip, with more children than we had, who only got 30/- a week. They had a much harder time than we did earning it and had no one to fall back on, as we had, in case of sudden illness or other emergency. We used to get free holidays, too, at Harlech when my mother would insist on paying the train-fare as well as giving us our board free. We really had nothing to complain about. Thinking how difficult life was for the labourers' wives kept Nancy permanently depressed.

were not true poets -- until only two names were left. I applied ~~to~~ ^{to} Delmore I liked too. He was gentle and I could see how he wrote at his poems. I was always interested in the writing-technique of my contemporaries. I once told him what I was of worry he must have had over the lines:

"Ah, no man knows
 Through what wild centuries
 Roves back the rose"

and how in the end he had been dissatisfied. He admitted that he had been forced to leave the assurance "Roves and rose" because no synonym for "roves" was strong enough. I seldom saw Gahert and Schewerell Sitwell after the war-years. When I did I always felt uncomfortably rustic in their society.
 Once Gahert sent me a present of a brace of grouse. They came from his country-residence in Derbyshire in a bag labelled:
 "With Captain Sitwell's compliments to Captain Graves." Nancy and I could neither of us face the task of plucking and gutting and roasting the birds so we gave them to a neighbour.
 I thanked Gahert: - "Captain Graves acknowledges with thanks Captain Sitwell's gift of Captain Graves."

Our total income, counting birthday and Christmas cheques from relatives was about £130 a year. As Nancy reminded me, this was about 50/- a week and there were farm labourers at Lisle, with more children than we had, who only got 30/- a week. They had a much harder time than we did earning it and had no one to fall back on, as we had, in case of sudden illness or other emergency. We used to get free holidays, too, at Harlech when my mother would insist on paying the train-fare as well as giving us our board free. We really had nothing to complain about. Thinking how difficult life was for the labourers' wives kept Nancy permanently depressed.

I have omitted to mention a further source of income -- the Rupert Brooke Fund of which Edward Marsh was the administrator. Rupert Brooke had stated in his will that all royalties accruing from any published work of his should be divided among needy poets with families to support. When money was very short we would dip into this bag. ^{called ourselves very} We ~~still~~ ^{Socialists} but had become dissatisfied with Parliamentary Socialism. We had greater sympathy with Communism, though not members of the Communist Party. None the less, when a branch of the Parliamentary Labour Party was formed in the village, we gave the use of the cottage for its weekly meetings throughout the winter months. Islip was a rich agricultural area; but with a reputation for slut-farming. It did not pay the tenant farmers to farm too well. Mr. Wise, one of our members, once ~~heckled a speaker in the~~ ^{heckled a speaker in the} Conservative interest about a protective duty imposed by the Conservative Government on dried currants. The speaker answered patronisingly, "Well, surely a duty on Greek currants won't hurt you working men here at Islip? You don't grow currants in these parts, do you?" "No, sir," replied Mr. Wise, "the farmers' main crop hereabouts is squitch."

I was persuaded to stand for the Parish Council, and was a member for a year. I wish I had taken records of the smothered antagonisms of the council-meetings. There were seven members of the council, with three representatives of labour and three representatives of the farmers and gentry; the chairman was a farmer, a liberal, who had labour support as being a generous employer and the only farmer in the neighbourhood who had had a training at an agricultural college. He held the balance very fairly. We contended over a proposed application to the District Council for the building of new cottages. Returned ex-soldiers who wished to marry had nowhere to live with their wives. The Conservative members opposed this because it would mean a penny on the rates. Then there was the question of procuring a recreation ground for the village. The football team did not wish to be dependent on the generosity of one of the big farmers, ~~who~~ ^{who rented it to us at a nominal rate}. The Conservatives opposed this again in the interest of the rates and pointed out that shortly after the armistice the village had turned down a recreation-ground scheme, preferring to spend the memorial-subscription money on a cenotaph. The labour members pointed out that the vote was taken, as at the 1918 General Election, before the soldiers had returned to ~~the~~ ^{express} their view. Nasty innuendoes were made about farmers who had stayed at home and made their pile, while their labourers fought and bled. The chairman calmed the antagonists. Another caricature scene; of myself in corduroys and a rough frieze coat, sitting in the village schoolroom (this time with no "evils of alcoholism" around the wall, but ^{with} nature drawings and mounted natural history specimens to take their place) debating as an Oxfordshire village elder whether or not Farmer So-and-So was justified in using a footpath across the allotments as a bridle-path, disregarding the decayed stile which, ~~he~~ ^I urged, disproved his right.

My association with the Labour Party ~~severed~~ severed my relations with the village gentry with whom, when I first came to the village, I had been on friendly terms. My mother had been to the trouble of calling on the rector when she viewed the property. I had even been asked by the rector to speak from the chancel steps of the village church at a War Memorial Service. He suggested that I should read poems about the war. Instead of Rupert Brooke on the glorious dead I read some of the more painful poems of Sassoon and Wilfred Owen about men dying of gas-poisoning and ^{about} buttocks of corpses bulging from the mud. And I suggested that the men who had fallen, destroyed as it were by the fall of the Tower of Siloam, had not been particularly virtuous or particularly wicked, but just average soldiers, and that the survivors should thank God that they were alive and do their best to avoid wars in the future. The church party, with the exception of the rector, an intelligent man, ^{was} scandalised. But the ex-service men had not been too well treated on their return and it pleased them to be reminded that they were on equal terms with the glorious dead. They were modest men: I noticed that though obeying the King's desire to wear their campaigning medals, they kept them buttoned up inside their coats. The leading Labour man of the village was William Beckley, senior. He had an inherited title dating from the time of Cromwell: he was known as 'Fisher' Beckley. A direct ancestor had been fishing on the Cherwell during the siege of Oxford and had ferried Cromwell himself and a body of Parliamentary troops over the river. In return Cromwell had given him the perpetual fishing-rights from Islip to the stretch of river where the Cherwell Hotel now stands. The cavalry skirmish at Islip bridge still remained in local tradition and a cottager ^{at the top of the hill} showed me a small stone cannon-ball fired on that occasion that he had found sticking in his chimney stack.

^{Butcher's Gun} Cromwell came late in the history of the ^{Beckley} family; the Beckleys were watermen on the river long before the seventeenth century. Indeed Fisher Beckley ^{lived by} family tradition ^{the exact spot} where a barge was sunk conveying stone for the building of Westminster Abbey. Islip was the birthplace of Edward the Confessor. The Abbey stone had been quarried from the side of the hill close to the river; ^{four} cottage was on the old slip-way down which the stone barges had been launched. ^{and} The Islip lands had been given by him to the ^{Abbey} Abbey it was still Abbey property after a thousand years.

Some time in the 'seventies American Weed was introduced into the river and made netting difficult; fishing finally became unprofitable. Fisher Beckley had been for many years now an agricultural labourer. His socialist views prevented him from getting employment in the village so he had to ^{trudge} to work ^{to} a farm some miles out. But he was still Fisher Beckley, ^(among us cottagers) and the most respected man in Islip.

should read poems about the war. Instead of Rupert Brooke on the glorious dead I read some of the more painful poems of Sassoon and Wilfred Owen about men dying of gas-poisoning and buttocks of corpses bulging from the mud. And I suggested that the men who had fallen, destroyed as it were by the fall of the Tower of Siloam, had not been particularly virtuous or particularly wicked, but just average soldiers, and that the survivors should thank God that they were alive and do their best to avoid wars in the future. The church party with the exception of the rector, an intelligent man, scandalised. But the ex-service men had not been too well treated on their return and it pleased them to be reminded that they were on equal terms with the glorious dead. They were modest men: I noticed that though obeying the King's desire to wear their campaigning medals, they kept them buttoned up inside their coats. The leading Labour man of the village was William Beckley, senior. He had an inherited title dating from the time of Cromwell: he was known as 'Fisher' Beckley. A direct ancestor had been fighting on the Chertwell during the siege of Oxford and had killed Cromwell himself and a body of Parliamentary troops over the river. In return Cromwell had given him the perfect

Handwritten signature

against the Church which had benefited by strips of glebe land. But Cromwell came late in the history of the family;
 the Beckleys were watermen on the river long before the seventeenth century. Indeed Fisher Beckley family tradition ^{the castle} where a barge was sunk conveying stone for the building of Westminster Abbey. Tally was the birthplace of Edward the Confessor. The Abbey stone had been quarried from the site of the mill close to the river; ^{two cottages} was on the old slip-way down which the stone barges had been lowered. The stone lands had been given by King to the Abbey which it was still a busy wharfery ^{level}

CHAPTER XXVII.

My parents were most disappointed when I failed to sit for my Oxford finals. But through the kindness of Sir Walter Raleigh the head of the English School I was excused finals as I had been excused everything else, and allowed to proceed to the later degree of Bachelor of Letters. Instead of estimating, at the examiners' request, the effect of the influence of Dryden on pastoral poets of the early eighteenth century, or tracing the development of the sub-plot in Elizabethan comedies between the years 1583 and 1594 I was allowed to offer a written thesis on a subject of my own choice. Sir Walter Raleigh was a good friend to me. He agreed to be my tutor ^{on condition that he should not be} [redacted] expected to tutor me. He liked my poetry, and suggested that we should only meet as friends. He was engaged at the time on [redacted] the official history of the War in the Air and found it necessary to have practical flying experience for the task. The R.A.F. took him up as often as he needed. It was on a flight out East that he got a touch of the sun and died. I was so saddened by his death that it was some time before I thought again about my thesis, and I did not apply for another tutor. The subject I had offered was the Illogical Element in English poetry. I had already written a prose book, On English Poetry, a series of 'workshop notes' about the writing of poetry. It contained much trivial ^{but also much practical} material. [redacted] and emphasised the impossibility of writing poetry of 'universal appeal.' I regarded poetry as, first, a personal cathartic for the poet suffering from some inner conflict and ^{then} [redacted] as a cathartic for readers in a similar conflict. I made a tentative connection between poetry and dream in the light of the dream-psychology in which I was now interested as a means of curing myself.

L The thesis did not work out like a thesis. I found it difficult to keep to an academic style and decided to write it as if it were an ordinary book. Anyhow I could expect no knowledge of or sympathy with modern psychology from the ^{Literature} committee that would read it. I re-wrote it in all nine times and it was unsatisfactory when ~~finished~~. I was trying to show the nature of the supra-logical element in poetry: ~~_____~~

~~_____~~ it was only ^{I write,} to be fully understood by close analysis of the latent associations of the words used; the obvious prose meaning was often in direct ^{opposition} ~~_____~~ with the latent content. The weakness of the book lay in its not ^{clearly} distinguishing between the supra-logical thought of ~~_____~~ ^{and of} ~~_____~~ ^{pathology.} poetry ~~_____~~

~~_____~~ Before it finally appeared I had published The Meaning of Dreams, which was intended to be a popular shillingsworth for the railway bookstall; but I went to the wrong publisher and he issued it at five shillings. Being too simply written for the informed public and too expensive for the ignorant public to which it was addressed, it fell flat; as indeed it deserved. I published a volume of poems every year between 1920 and 1925; after The Pier-Glass, published in 1921, I made no attempt to write for the ordinary reading public. Of these books Whipp & Ginny published in 1923 showed the first signs of my new psychological studies.

Mock-Beggar Hall published in 1924 was almost wholly philosophical. As Lawrence wrote to me when I sent it to him, it was "not the sort of book that one would put under one's pillow at night." This philosophic interest was a result of my meeting with Basanta Mallik, when I was reading a paper to an undergraduate-society. One of the results of my education was a strong prejudice, amounting to contempt, ~~for~~ ^{against} anyone of non-European race; the Jews, though with certain exceptions such as Siegfried, were included in this prejudice. But I had none of my usual feelings with Basanta.

~~He~~ ^{He} did not behave as a member of a subject-race; ~~neither with~~ ^{neither with} excessive admiration ^{or} ~~or~~ ^{with} excessive hatred of all things English.

~~Thought he was~~ ^{Thought he was} a Bengali ~~he was not willing to~~ ^{he was not willing to} flattery or insolence. ~~He~~ ^{He} I found on enquiry that he belonged to a family of high caste. His father had become converted to Christianity and signalled his freedom from Hindu superstition by changing his diet; meat and alcohol, untouched by his ancestors for some two thousand years, soon brought about his death. Basanta had been brought up in the care of a still unconverted grandmother, but did not have the strict Hindu education that the boy of caste is given by his male relatives. He was sent to Calcutta University, and, ^{some years before the war,} after taking a law degree, was given the post of assistant tutor to the children of the Maharajah of Nepal. In Nepal he came to the notice of the Maharajah as one of the few members of the Court not concerned in a plot against his life and was promoted to ^{chief tutor}

The relations between Nepal and India were ^{at this time} strained; Basanta was the only man in Nepal with an up to date knowledge of international law. His advice ultimately enabled the Maharajah to ^{induce} ~~get~~ the British to sign the 1923 ^{a treaty} recognizing the complete independence of the country, which had ~~always been~~ ^{for many years} threatened with British protection. Under the terms of this treaty no foreigners might enter Nepal except at the personal invitation of the Maharajah.

The Maharajah was ~~delighted~~ ^(delighted) with Basanta and sent him to England to study British political psychology; this knowledge might be useful in the event of future misunderstandings between Nepal and India. He had now been some eleven years in Oxford; ~~and~~ ^{but} becoming a philosopher and making many friends, had overcome his long-standing grudge against the British.

Basanta used to come out to Islip frequently to talk philosophy with us. With him came Sam Harries, a young Balliol scholar who soon became our closest friend. Metaphysics soon made psychology of secondary interest for me; it threatened almost to displace poetry. Basanta's philosophy was a development of formal metaphysics, but with characteristically Indian insistence on ethics. He believed in no hierarchy of ultimate values or the possibility of any unifying religion or ideology. But at the same time he insisted on the necessity of strict self-discipline in the individual in meeting every possible demand made upon him from whatever quarter, and he recommended constant self-watchfulness against either dominating or being dominated by any other individual. This view of strict personal morality consistent with scepticism of social morality agreed very well with my practice.)

He returned to India in 1923, ~~and~~

and considered taking an appointment in ~~months~~

Nepal but decided that ^{to do so} ~~the~~ ^{would put him in a position} ~~self~~ ^{incompatible} with his philosophy.

^{He would have returned to Oxford but a} ~~friend~~ had died, leaving him to support a typical large Hindu family of aunts and cousins remotely related. We missed Basanta's visits, but Sam used to come out regularly. Sam was a Communist, an atheist, enthusiastic about ^{professional football} Aston Villa ^{was his favourite team} and experimental films and most puritannical in matters of sex. ^{PP} Our friends were not numerous; ~~many~~

Edith Sitwell was ^{one of them} ~~one of them~~ ^{It} was ^a surprise after reading ~~her~~ her poems to find her gentle, domesticated and even devout. ^{When} She came to stay with us, ^{she spent her time sitting} on the sofa and hemming handkerchiefs. She used to write to Nancy and me frequently ~~to~~, but 1926 ended the friendship. 1926 was yesterday when the autobiographical part of my life was fast approaching its end.)

~~I~~ saw no more of any of my army friends with the exception of Siegfried, and meetings with him were now ^{rare} ~~few~~. Edmund Blunden had gone as professor of English Literature to Tokyo. Lawrence was now in the Royal Tank Corps. He had enlisted in the Royal Air Force when he came to the end of things after the middle-eastern settlement of 1921, but had been forced to leave it when ^{notice was given of} ~~the~~ question ~~was~~ in the House about his presence ^{there under an assumed name.} When Sir Walter Raleigh died I felt my connection with ^{Oxford} ~~my~~ University was broken, and when Rivers died, and George Mallory on Everest, it seemed as though the death of my friends was following me in peacetime as relentlessly as in war. Basanta had spoken of getting an invitation from the Maharajah for us to visit Nepal with him, but ^{when he found it impossible} ~~to~~ ~~to~~ resume his work there, the idea had lapsed. Sam went to visit him in India in 1924; ^{His} reputation as a Communist followed him there. He wrote that he was tagged ^{wherever he went in Calcutta} by policemen; but they need not have worried. A week or two after his arrival he died of cerebral malaria. After Sam's death our friendship with Basanta gradually failed. India re-absorbed him, and we changed.

There came one more death among our friends; a girl who had been a friend of Sam's at Oxford and had married another friend at Balliol. They used to come out together to Islip with Basanta and talk philosophy. She died in childbirth. There had been insufficient care in the pre-natal period and a midwife ~~xxx~~ attended the case without having sterilised her hands after attending an infectious case near by. Deaths in childbirth had a particular horror for me now as they had for Nancy. I had assisted the midwife at the birth of Sam, our fourth child, and could not have believed that a natural process like birth could ~~be~~ st be so abominable in its pain and extravagant messiness. These deaths and a feeling of bad luck clouded these years. Islip was no longer a country refuge. I found myself resorting to my war-time technique of getting through things somehow, ^{anyhow}, in the hope that they would mend. Nancy was in poor health and able to do less and less work. Our finances had been improved by an allowance from Nancy's father that covered the extra expense of the new children, ^{- we now had about £200 a year -} but I decided that cottage life with four of them under six years old and Nancy ill was not good enough. I would have after all to take a job. Nancy and I had always sworn that we would manage somehow so that this would not be necessary.

The only possible job that I could undertake was teaching. But I needed a degree, so I completed my thesis, which I published under the title of Poetic Unreason and handed in, when in print, to the examining board. I was most surprised when they accepted it and I had my bachelor's degree. But the problem of an appointment remained. I did not want a preparatory or secondary-school job which would keep me away from home all day. Nancy did not want anyone else but myself and her looking after the children, so there seemed no solution. And then the doctor told Nancy that if she wished to regain her health she must spend the winter in Egypt. In fact the only appointment that would be at all suitable would be a teaching job in Egypt at a very high salary, where there was little work to do. And a week or two later (for this is the way things have always happened to me in emergencies) I was asked to offer myself as a candidate for the post of Professor of English Literature at the newly founded Egyptian University at Cairo. I had been recommended, I found out later, by two or three influential friends, among them Arnold Bennett, ~~_____~~ who has always been a good friend to me, and Lawrence, who had served in the war with Lord Lloyd, the then High Commissioner of Egypt. The salary amounted, with the passage money, to fourteen hundred pounds a year. I fortified these recommendations with others from my neighbour Colonel John Buchan, and from the Earl of Oxford, who had taken a fatherly interest in me and often visited Islip. And so was given the appointment.

Among other books ~~_____~~ written by ~~_____~~ ^{in the Islip period} were two essays on contemporary poetry. I then held the view that there was not such a thing as poetry of constant value; I regarded it as a product of its period only having relevance in a limited context. I regarded all poetry, in a philosophic sense, as of equal merit, though ^{admitting that} at any given time ^{pragmatic} distinctions could be drawn between ^{such} poems ^{as} which embodied the conflicts and syntheses of the time and therefore were ^{charged with contemporary sagacity} and those ^{such as} that were ^{Literary} hang-overs from a preceding period and ^{were} therefore ^{inept.}

. I was in fact finding only extrinsic values for poetry. I found psychological reasons why poems of a particular sort appealed to a particular class of reader, surviving even political, economic and religious change. I published two other books. One was waste — a ballad opera called John Kemp's Wager. It marked the end of what I may call the folk-song period of my life. It was an artificial simple play for performance by village societies and has been once performed in California. The newspaper cuttings that I was sent described it as delightfully English and quaint. A better book was My Head, My Head, a romance on the story of Elijah and the Shunamite woman. It was an ingenious attempt to repair the important omissions in the biblical story; but like ^{all} the other prose-books that I had written up to ^{this} time it failed in its chief object, which was to sell. ^{During this period I was willing to} undertake almost any writing job to bring in money. I wrote a series of rhymes for a big map-advertisement for Huntly & Palmer's biscuits (I was paid, but the rhymes never appeared); and ^{silly} lyrics for a light opera, Lord Clencarty, for which I was not paid because the opera was never staged; and translations from Dutch and German carols; and rhymes for childrens' Christmas annuals; and edited three sixpenny pamphlets of verse for Benn's popular series — selections from Skelton's poems, and from my own, and a collection of the less familiar nursery rhymes. I did some verse-reviewing for the Nation and Athenaeum, but by 1925 I found it more and more difficult to be patient with dud books of poetry. And they all seemed to be dud now.)

I had agreed to collaborate with T. S. Eliot in a book about modernist poetry to which we were each to contribute essays, but the plan fell through and later I was glad that it had.

373 R

FP I also made several attempts during these years to rid myself of the poison of war-memories by finishing my novel, but I had to abandon them. It was not only that they brought back neurasthenia but that I was ashamed at having distorted my material with a plot and yet not sure enough of myself to retranslate it into undisguised history. If my scruples had been literary and not moral I could easily have compromised, as many writers have since done, with a pretended diary stylistically disguising characters, times and dates. I had found the same difficulty in my last year at Chartreuse with a projected novel of public school life.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

So second-class by P. and O. to Egypt with a nurse for the children, a new wardrobe in the new cabin-trunks and a good-looking motor-car in the hold. Lawrence had written to me:

"Egypt, being so near Europe, is not a savage country. The Egyptians you need not dwell among. Indeed it will be a miracle if an Englishman can get to know them. The bureaucrat society is exclusive, and lives smilingly unaware of the people. Partly because so many foreigners come there for pleasure, in the winter; and the other women, who live there, must be butterflies too, if they would consort with the visitors.

I thought the salary attractive. It has just been raised. The work may be interesting, or may be terrible, according to whether you get keen on it, like Hearn, or hate it, like Nichols. Even if you hate it, there will be no harm done. The climate is good, the country beautiful, the things admirable, the beings curious and disgusting: and you are stable enough not to be caught broadside by a mere dislike for your job. Execute it decently, as long as you draw the pay, and enjoy your free hours (plentiful in Egypt) more freely.

Roam about -- Palestine. The Saharah oases. The Red Sea province. Sinai (a jolly desert). The Delta Swamps. Wilfred Jennings Bramly's buildings in the Western Desert. The divine mosque architecture of Cairo town.

Yet possibly you will not dislike the job. I think the coin spins evenly. The harm to you is little, for the family will benefit by a stay in the warm (Cairo isn't warm, in winter) and the job won't drive you into frantic excesses of rage. And the money will be useful. You should save a good bit of your pay after the expense of the first six months. I recommend the iced coffee at Groppi's.

And also my blessing.

I had a married half-brother and half-sister in Cairo who had both been there since I was a little boy. My brother, a leading government official (at a salary less than my own), and his wife viewed my coming to Egypt, I heard, with justifiable alarm. They had heard of my political opinions. My sister, to whom I was devoted, had no such suspicions and wrote a letter of most affectionate welcome. Siegfried came to see me off. He said, "Do you know who's on board? 'The Image!'"

He's still in the regiment, going to join the battalion in India. Last time I saw him he was sitting in the bottom of a dug-out gnawing a chunk of bully Beef like a rat." The Image had been at my last preparatory school, ^{and} had won a scholarship at the same time as myself; and ^{we} had been ^{at} Wrexham and Liverpool ^{together}; ~~he had~~ ^{and he had} been wounded with the Second Battalion at High Wood at the same time as myself; and now we were travelling out East together. A man with whom I had nothing in common; there ^{was} no natural reason why we should have been thrown so often in each other's company. The ship touched at Gibraltar where we disembarked and bought figs and rode round the town. I remembered the cancelled War Office telegram and thought what a fool I had been to prefer Rhyl. At Port Said a friend of my sister's helped us through the customs; I was feeling very sea-sick but I knew that I was in the East because he began talking about Kipling and Kipling's wattles of Lichtenburg and whether they were really wattles or some allied plant. And so to Cairo, looking out of the windows all the way, delighted at summer fields in January.

My sister-in-law advised us against the more exclusive residential suburb of Heliopolis where she had just taken a flat herself, so with her help we found one.

^P ~~We took a flat~~ at Heliopolis a few miles ^{east of} ~~outside~~ Cairo. We found the cost of living very high, for this was the tourist season. But I was able to reduce the grocery bill by taking advantage of the more reasonable prices of the British army canteen; I presented myself an officer on the pension list. We had two Sudanese servants, and, contrary to all that we had been warned about native servants they were temperate, punctual, respectful, and never, to my knowledge, stole a thing. ^{beyond the remains of a single joint of mutton.} It seemed queer to me not to look after the children or do housework and almost too good to be true to have as much time as I needed for my writing.

The University was an invention of King Fuad's, who had always been anxious to be known as a patron of the arts and sciences. There had been a Cairo University before this one, but it had been nationalistic in its policy and, not being directed by European experts or supported by the Government, had soon come to an end. The new University had been planned ambitiously. There were faculties of science, medicine, and letters, with a full complement of highly paid professors; only one or two of these were Egyptian, the rest ^{being} ~~were~~ English, Swedes, ^{ish} French and Belgians. The medicine and science faculties were predominantly English, but the appointments to the faculty of letters were predominantly French. They had been made in the summer months when the British High Commissioner was out of Egypt, or he would no doubt have ~~discountenanced~~ ^{discountenanced} them. Only one of the French and Belgian professors had any knowledge of English and none of them had any knowledge of Arabic. Of the two hundred Egyptian students, who were mostly the sons of rich merchants and landowners, ~~fewer~~ ^{fewer} than twenty had more than a smattering of French, ^{- just enough for shopping purposes -} though they had ^{all} learned English in the secondary schools. All official university correspondence was in Arabic. I was told that it was classical Arabic in which no word is admitted that is of later date than Mohammed; but I could not tell the difference. The "very learned Sheikh" Graves had to take his letters to the post office for interpretation. My twelve or thirteen French colleagues were men of the highest academic distinction. But two or three English village-schoolmasters would have been glad to have undertaken their work at one third of their salaries and done it far better. The University-building had been a harem-palace of the Khedive. It was French in style, with mirrors and gilding.

~~_____~~
~~_____~~
~~_____~~
~~_____~~

A British official at the Ministry of Education told me that I must keep the British flag flying in the Faculty of Letters. This embarrassed me. I had not come to Egypt as an ambassador of Empire and yet I did not intend to let the French and wife in semi-political activities at my expense.

The Dean, M. Grégoire, was a Belgian, an authority on Slav poetry. He was tough, witty, and ran his show very plausibly. He had acquired a certain slyness and adaptability during the war when, as a civilian in Belgium under German occupation, he had edited an underground anti-German publication. The Professor of French Literature had lost a leg in France. He greeted me at first in a patronising way: I was his young friend rather than his dear colleague. But as soon as he learned that I (had also) bled in the cause of civilisation and France I became his not esteemed friend.

The Frenchmen lectured,
but with the help of Arabic interpreters, which did not make either for speed or accuracy. I found that I was expected to give two lectures a week. But the Dean soon decided that They must be given special instruction in French

the students if they were ever to dispense with the interpreters. which reduced the time for lectures, so that I had only one a week to give.

This one was pandemonium. The students were not hostile, merely excitable and anxious to show their regard for me and liberty and Zaghlul Pasha and the well-being of Egypt all at the same time. I often had to shout at the top of my loudest barrack-square voice to restore order. They had no text-books of any sort; there were no English books in the University library, and it took months to get any through the French librarian. This was January and they were due for an examination in May. They were most anxious to master Shakespeare, Byron and Wordsworth in that time.
I had no desire to teach Wordsworth and Byron to anyone, and I wished to protect Shakespeare from them. I decided to lecture on the most rudimentary forms of literature possible. I chose the primitive ballad and its development into epic and the drama. I thought that this would at least teach them the meaning of the simpler literary terms.
But English was not easy for them in spite of having learned it for eight years or so in the schools. Nobody, for instance, when I spoke of a ballad-maker singing to his harp, knew what a harp was. I told them it was what

King David played upon, and drew ^{aperture of} it on the blackboard; ^{at which} they shouted out "O, anur." They were most anxious to be given printed notes of my lectures ^{with which} to prepare them ^{also} for the examinations. I tried to make the clerical staff of the faculty duplicate ^{some} them for me, but in spite of promises I never got them done; my lectures in the end ^{became a} dictation ^{of lecture notes for lectures that could not be given - this at any rate} of ~~_____~~ kept ^{the students} them busy.

^{But they} ~~_____~~ thought it beneath their dignity to admit the existence of ballads in Egypt; though I had myself seen the communal ballad group in action at the hind legs of the Sphinx, where a gang of Fellaheen ^{was} clearing away the sand. One of the ^{gang} ~~_____~~ was a chanty-man; ^{his whole job was to keep the others moving.} ~~_____~~. The Fellaheen did not exist for the students; they thought of them as animals. ~~_____~~

~~_____~~ They were interested in my clothes; my trousers were the first Oxford trousers that they had seen in Egypt; their own were narrow at the ankles. So I set a new fashion. One evening I went to dine with the rector of the University. Two of my students, sons of ^{Ministers} ~~_____~~ happened also to be invited. They noticed that I was wearing white silk socks with my evening dress. Later I heard from the vice-rector, Ali Bey Omar, ^{whom I liked best of} ~~_____~~ the University ^{officials} ~~_____~~, that a day or two later he had seen the same students at a ^{government} ~~_____~~ banquet ^{wearing} white silk socks ~~_____~~. When they looked ^{on} round the distinguished assembly they found that they were ^{the only white socks present.} ~~_____~~. Ali Bey Omar gave a pantomime account of how they ^{surreptitiously} tried to loosen their braces and ^{strike} down their trousers to King David played upon, and drew it on the blackboard. They were most anxious to be given printed notes of my lectures to prepare them for the examinations. I tried to make the original staff of the faculty duplicate for me, but in spite of promises I never got them done; my lectures in the end [redacted] dictation [redacted] kept them busy.

29 days, Sunday

[redacted] thought it beneath their dignity to admit the existence of ballads in Egypt though I had myself seen the communal ballad group in action at the hind legs of the Sphinx, where a gang of Fellahs were clearing away the sand. One of the [redacted] was a chatty man. The Fellahs did not exist for the students; they thought of them as animals.

They were interested in my clothes; my trousers were the first Oxford trousers that they had seen in Egypt; their own were narrow at the ankles. So I set a new fashion. One evening I went to dine with the rector of the University. Two of my students, sons of [redacted] happened also to be invited. They noticed that I was wearing white silk socks with my evening dress. Later I heard from the vice-rector, Ali Bey Omar, [redacted] the University [redacted] that a day or two later he had seen the same students at [redacted] white silk socks. When they looked round the distinguished assembly they found that they were [redacted] Ali Bey Omar gave a pantomime account of how they surreptitiously tried to loosen their breeches and [redacted] down their trousers to hide their shame.

For some weeks I missed even my single hour a week because the students went on strike. It was ~~the~~ Ramadan, ~~and~~ they had to fast ^{for forty days} between sunrise and sunset. Between sunset and sunrise they ate rather more than usual in compensation and this dislocation of their digestive processes had a bad effect on their nerves. I have forgotten ~~xxxx~~ the pretext of the strike: it was some trouble about the intensive French instruction. The fact was that they wanted leisure at home to read up their notes of the earlier work of the term in preparation for the examination. The Professor of Arabic, who was one of the few Egyptians with a reputation as an orientalist, published a book calling attention to pre-Islamic sources of the Koran. His lectures, delivered in Arabic, demanded more exertion from them than any of the others, so, when the examination came round, most of them absented themselves from the Arabic paper on religious grounds. To an orthodox Mohammedan the Koran, being dictated by God, can have no pre-Islamic sources.

I only came to know two of my students fairly well; one was a Greek, the other a Turk. The Turk was an intelligent, good-natured young man perhaps twenty years old. He was very rich and had a motor-car in which he twice took me for a drive to the pyramids. He talked both French and English ^{fluently} being ^{about the only one} ~~being~~ (except ~~the~~ ^{for} twelve who had attended a French Jesuit College) who could do so. He told me one day that he would not be able to attend my ^{next} lecture as he was going to be married. I asked him whether this was the first or second part of the ceremony; he said that it was the first. When he returned he told me that he had not yet been allowed to see the face of his wife, because her family was orthodox; ^{to} ~~he~~ would only ^{see it} ~~be~~ at the second ceremony. ^{But} ~~that~~ his sister had been at school with her and said that she was pretty and a good sort; ^{and} her father was a friend of his father's. Later, the second ceremony took place and he confessed himself perfectly satisfied. I learned that it seldom happened that when the veil was lifted the bridegroom refused the bride, though he ^{she had a similar right} had the right to do so. Usually the couple contrived to meet before even the first ceremony. The girl would slip the man a note saying, "I shall be at Maison Cicurel at the hat-counter at 3.30 to-morrow afternoon if you want to see me. It will be quite in order for me to lift my veil to try on a hat. You will recognise me by my purple parasol." ¶ I enquired about the rights of Mohammedan women in Egypt. Apparently divorce was simple; the man only had to say in the presence of a witness, "I divorce you, I divorce you, I divorce you," and she was divorced. On the other hand she was entitled to take her original dowry back with her with the interest that had accrued on it during her married life. Dowries were always heavy and divorces comparatively rare. It was considered very low-class to have more than one wife; that was a Fellaheen habit. I was told a story of an Egyptian who was angry with his wife one morning because the coffee was badly made ~~at~~ breakfast. He shouted out, "I divorce you, I divorce you, I divorce you." "Oh, my dear," she said, "now you've done it. The servants have heard what you said. I must go back to my father with my ten thousand pounds and my ^{sixty} ~~seventy~~ camels." He apologised for his hasty temper. "We must be re-married," he said, "as soon as possible." She reminded him that the law prevented them marrying again unless there were an intermediate marriage.

^{from}
So he called in a very old man who was watering the lawn and ordered him to marry her. He was to understand that it was a marriage of form only. So the gardener married the woman and immediately after the ceremony returned to his watering-pot. Two days later the woman died, and the gardener inherited the money and the camels.

The Greek invited me to tea once. He had three beautiful sisters named Pallas, Aphrodite and Artemis.
They gave me tea in the garden with European cakes that they had learned to make at the American college. Next door to ~~the~~ a pale-faced man ~~was~~ on ^{a third-floor} balcony ^{Pallas} was addressing the world ~~in~~. I asked ~~him~~ what he was saying. "Oh," she said, "don't mind him; he's a millionaire, so the police leave him alone. He's quite mad. ^{He lived ten years in England.} He's saying now that they're burning him up with electricity, and he's telling the birds all his troubles.
He says that his secretary accuses him of stealing five piastres from him, and it isn't true. Now he's saying that there can't be a God because God wouldn't allow the English to steal the Fellaheen's camels for the war and not return them. Now he's saying that all religions are very much the same and that Buddha is as good as Mohammed.
But really," she said, "he's quite mad. He keeps a little dog in his house, actually in his very room, and plays with it and talks to it as though it were a human being."
^(Dogs are unclean in Egypt.)
She told me that in another twenty years the women of Egypt would be in control of everything. The feminist movement had just started and as the women of Egypt were ^{by} far the most active and intelligent part of the population
^{She said that neither she nor her sisters would stand her father's attempts to keep them in their places.} great changes were to be expected. Her brother showed me his library. He was doing the arts-course as a preliminary to law. Besides his legal text-books he had Voltaire, Rousseau, a number of ^{Samuel} French novels in paper covers, Shakespeare's works and Samuel Smiles' Self Help. ^{a book which I had never met before.} He asked my advice about his career and I advised him to go to a European University because an arts degree at Cairo would be of little advantage to him.

I did not pay an official call at the Residency at first, though my brother urged it as etiquette; I decided not to ~~visit~~ until I had seen how things were at the University. I had not realised before ~~coming~~ ⁱⁿ Egypt to what extent the British were in power ~~there~~. I had been told that Egypt was an independent kingdom, but it seemed that my principal ~~al~~ allegiance was not to the King who had given me my appointment and paid me my salary but to the British High Commissioner. Infantry, ^{cavalry} ~~battalions~~ and air squadrons were a reminder of his power. The British officials could not understand the Egyptians' desire to be rid of them. They considered Egypt most ungrateful for all the painful and difficult administrative work that they had put into it since the '80's, raising it from a bankrupt country to one of the richest in the world. None of them took Egyptian nationalism seriously; there was no Egyptian nation, they said. The ~~other~~ Greeks, Turks, Syrians and Armenians who called themselves Egyptians had no more right in the country than the British. Before the British occupation they had bled the Fellaheen white. The Fellaheen were the only true Egyptians and it was not they who called for freedom. Freedom was mere politics, a symptom of the growing riches of the country and the smatterings of Western education that they ^{had} brought with them. The reduction of the British official class in the last few years was viewed with disgust. "We did all the hard work and when we go everything will run down; it's running down already. And they'll have to call us back or if not us, the dago^s, and we don't see why they should benefit."

Egypt now considered itself a European nation. At the same time it attempted to take the place of Turkey as the leading power of Islam. This led to many anomalies. On the same day that the University students made the protest against the Professor of Arabic, ^{his irreligious views} the students of El Azhar, the great Cairo theological college, struck against having to wear the Arab dress of ~~kaftan~~ ^{and silk head-dress} and appeared in European dress and tarbouche. The tarbouche was the national ~~hat~~ ^{hat}; even British officials wore it. I ^{myself} had a tarbouche. Being red it attracted the heat of the sun, ^{and} it was stuffy inside and did not protect the back of the head. It would have been difficult to have found ^{a hat} more unsuitable ~~for~~ for the climate.

I did two useful pieces of educational work in Egypt. I ordered a library of standard text-books of English literature for the Faculty Library at the University (from which I hope ^{Mr Bonnamy Dobree,} my successor, profited). And I acted as examiner to the diploma class of the Higher Training College, which provided English teachers for the primary and secondary schools. The following is the substance of a letter handed to me for information as member of the Board of Examiners concerned :-

* To The Principal, Higher Training College, Cairo.

Sir:

In accordance with your instructions, I beg to submit the following statement of the works read by the Diploma Class for the forthcoming Examination in English Literature (1580 to 1788) and in Science:

ENGLISH LITERATURE.

1. Shakespeare's Macbeth.
2. Lobban's, The Spectator Club, p.39 and Sir Roger and the Widow, p.51; (111) 5 Essays of Addison, Fans, p.64;

They did not realise how much the ranks of the Egyptians - probably the rainiest people in the world - was hurt by the constant sight of British uniforms.

- The Vision of Mirza, p.72; Sir Roger at the Assizes, p.68; Sir Roger at the Abbey, p.81; Sir Roger at the Play, p.86.
3. Galsworthy's Justice.
 4. Dryden:-
 - (a) with class 4A, the following poems in Hales' Longer English Poems:-
 - (i) Mac Flecknoe (omitting lines 76-77; 83-86; 142-145; 154-155; 160-165; 170-181; 192-197).
 - (ii) The Song for St. Cecilia's Day (Hales, p.32).
 - (iii) Alexander's Feast (Hales, p.34).
 - (b) with class 4B:- the extracts from Absalom and Achitophel in Gwynn's Masters of English Literature, p.144-145 (characters of Shaftsbury and Buckingham).
 5. Pope :-
 - (a) with 4A, in Hales' Longer English Poems:-The Rape of the Lock (omitting lines 27-104; 221-282; 449-466; 483 to the end).
 - (b) with 4B, the character of "Atticus" in Gwynn's Masters of Eng. Lit., p.181.
 6. Johnson's Vanity of Human Wishes, in Hales', p.65 (Omitting lines 241 - 342).
 7. Goldsmith's Vicar of Wakefield. (All done by 4A; but only to the end of chap.19 in 4B.)
 8. Goldsmith's The Traveller, in Hales', p.91.
 9. Gray's Elegy, in Hales', p.79.

I regret that lack of time has prevented us from studying the works of Milton and Spenser or the prose works of Dr. Johnson.

SCIENCE.

1. Episodes 1,2,3 and 6 of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle's Memoirs of Sherlock Holmes.
2. The first seven chapters of Sir Ray Lankester's Science from an Easy Chair.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant, etc.

~~_____~~
~~_____~~ These are my contemporary comments, pinned to the letter:-

"When some forty years ago England superseded France as the controlling European Power in Egypt, English was at first taught in the schools as an alternative to French, but gradually became dominant as the European administrative language, though French remained the chief language of commerce and culture. As a result, the young Egyptian, who now definitely claims himself a European and denies his African inheritance, has come to have two distinct minds (switched off and on casually), the irresponsible hedonistic café and cinema mind, which leans towards French, and the grave moralizing bureaucratic mind, which leans towards English. Early English educationalists in Egypt shrewdly decided to give their students a moralistic character-forming view of English literature; and this tradition continues as a counterpoise to the boulevard view of life ^{absorbed} ~~absorbed~~ from ^{translations of} French yellow-back novels. But the student of 1926 is not so well-instructed in English as his predecessor of ten years ago, because the English educational staff has gradually been liquidated and the teaching of English is now principally in the hands of Egyptians, former students, who are not born teachers or disciplinarians. The western spirit of freedom as naively interpreted by the Egyptian student ^{by himself} ~~great~~ ~~great~~ Egyptian education. The primary and secondary schools, not to mention the University, are always either on strike, threatening a strike or prevented from striking by being given a holiday. So work gets more and more behindhand. Even the Higher Training College is not free from such disturbances, which possibly account for the ^{regretted} ~~neglect~~ neglect of Milton, ~~Spenser~~ Spenser and the prose works of Dr. Johnson. This Diploma Class consists of students who, after some twelve years' study of English, the last four or five years under English instructors, are now qualifying to teach the language and literature to their compatriots.

"The Egyptian student is embarrassingly friendly, very quick at learning by heart, disorderly ~~disorderly~~

~~_____~~ lazy, ^{rhetorical} ~~_____~~, slow to reason and absolutely without any curiosity for general knowledge. The most satisfactory way to treat him is with a leisurely and good humoured sarcasm, which he respects: but if he once gets politically excited nothing is any use but an affected violent loss of temper. When introduced to the simpler regions of English literature he finds himself most in sympathy with the eighteenth century, and the English instructor, if he wishes to get any results at all, must be ready to regard Shakespeare, Galsworthy and Conan Doyle as ^{either} immature or decadent figures in relation to ~~_____~~ ^{The} Classical Period. The Science referred to in the ~~_____~~ ^{attached} letter is supposed to educate the student in twentieth-century rationalism, ^{to which he given an eighteenth-century cast.} ~~_____~~

~~_____~~ ^{the} following essay ~~_____~~ is the work of one Mahmoud Mohammed Mahmoud of the Diploma Class, and refers principally to two chapters of Sir Ray Lankester's Science from an Easy Chair. -

Environment as a Factor in Evolution.

This is the theory of evolutions. Once it was thought that the earth's crust was caused by catastrophes, but when Darwin came into the world and had a good deal of philosophy, he said "All different kinds of species differ gradually as we go backwards and there is no catastrophes, and if we apply the fact upon previous predecessors we reach simpler and simpler predecessors, until we reach the Nature." Man also is under the evolutions. None can deny this if he could deny the sun in daylight. A child from the beginning of the birthday possesses insects like to suckle his food from the mamel of his mother and many others. But he is free of habits and he is weak as anything. Then he is introduced into a house and usually finds himself among parents and his body is either cleansed or left to the dirt. This shows his environment. Superficial thinkers are apt to look on environment as (at best) a trifle motive in bringing up, but learned men believe that a child born in the presence of some women who say a bad word, this word, as believed by them, remains in the brain of the child until it ejects.

Environment quickly supplies modification. The life of mountainous goats leads them to train themselves on jumping. The camel is flat-footed with hoofs for the sand. Some kind of cattle were wild in the past but lived in plain lands and changed into gentle sheep. The frog when young has her tail and nostrils like the fish, suitable for life at sea, but changing her environment, the tail decreased. The sea is broad and changeable, so those who live at sea are changeable and mysterious. Put a cow in a dirty damp place and she will become more and more slender until she die. Also horses: horse had five fingers on his legs but now one only from running for water in the draught. Climate also affects bodily habits of the dear Europeans who live in Egypt. They who were smart and patient and strong with a skin worth the name of weatherproof become also fatigable and fond of leisure... From the theory we learn that human beings should be improved like the beasts by creating healthy youngs and by good Freubel education.

"The next short specimen essay by Mohammed Mahmoud Mohammed is in answer to the question: "What impression do you get from Shakespeare of the character of Lady Macbeth?" :-

The Character of Lady Macbeth.

Sir, to write shortly, Lady Macbeth was brave and venturesome: but she had no tact. She says to Macbeth, "Now the opportunity creates itself, lose it not. Where is your manlihood in these suitable circumstances? I have children and I know the love of a mother's heart. But you must know I would dash the child's head and drive away the boneless teeth which are milking me rather than to give a promise and then leave it."

Macbeth says, "But we may fail."

"Fail?" says L.M. "But stick to the point and we will not fail. Leave the rest to me. I shall put ^{s/} drugs in the grooms' drink and we shall accuse them."

Macbeth says, "You are fit to lay men children only."

The impression on the reader becomes very great and feels with anger.

"And this from the hand of Mahmoud Mahmoud Mohammed, offered as ^a formal exercise in English composition on:

~~the character of~~

page 389 misplaced.

The Best Use of Leisure Time

Leisure time is a variety to tireful affairs. God Almighty created the Universe in six days and took a rest in the seventh. He wished to teach us the necessity of Leisure time. Man soon discovered by experience that "All work and no play makes Jack a dull boy." But this leisure time may be dangerous and ill-used if the mind will not take its handle and move it wisely to different directions. Many people love idleness. It is a great prodigality which leads to ruin. Many Egyptians spend their times in cafés longing for women and tracking them with their eyes, which corrupts and pollutes manners. They are perplexed and annoyed by the length of daytime. Others try to have rest through gambling, which is the scourge of society and individual. But let us rather enjoy external nature, the beautiful leavy trees, the flourishing fields and the vast lawns of green grass starred with myriads of flowers of greater or small size. There the birds sing and build their nests, the meandering canals flow with fresh water and the happy peasants, toiling afar from the multitude of town life, purify the human wishes from personal stain. Also museums are instructive. It is quite wrong to keep to usual work and fatigable studies, but quite right to free our minds from the web of worldly affairs in which they are entangled.

Yes, let us with the lark leave our beds to enjoy the cool breeze before sunrise. Let us when the lasy or luxurious are snoring or sunk in their debaucheries sit under the shady trees and meditate. We can think of God, the river and the moon and enjoy the reading of Gray's Elegy to perfection. We shall brush the dues on the lawn at sunrise, for,

"A country life is sweet
In moderate cold and heat."

Or we may read the Best Companions, books full of honourable passions, wise moral and good pathos: reading maketh a full man, nobody will deny Bacon. Or we may easily get a musical instrument at little price. "Every schoolboy knows" that music is a moral law which gives a soul to the universe. Criminals can be cured by the sweet power of music. The whale came up from the dark depth of the sea to carry the Greek musician because it was affected by the sweet harmonies which hold a mirror up to nature. Are we not better than the whale? Also gymnastic clubs are spread everywhere. Why do a youth not pass his leisure time in widdening his chest? Because a sound mind is in a sound body. Yet it is a physiological fact that the blacksmith cannot spend his leisure time in striking iron or the soldier in military exercises. The blacksmith may go to see the Egyptian Exhibition, and the soldier may go to the sea to practice swimming or to the mountains to know its caves in order that he may take shelter in time of war.

Milton knew the best uses of leisure time. He used to sit to his books reading and to his music playing and so put his name among the immortals. That was the case of Byron, Napoleon, Addison, and Palmerstone. And if a man is unhappy, says an ancient philosopher, it is his own fault. He can be happy if his leisure time brings profit and not disgrace.

"The Diploma Class students ^{are} supposed to be four years in advance of most of t ^{my own} ~~the~~ and, not being of the moneyed class, ^{are} more interested in passing their examinations with distinction. Also, since their careers as teachers of English depend on the continuance of the British military occupation, they ~~take~~ take the literary morality of ^{this} ~~the~~ régime ^{more} seriously than the ~~the~~ University students. ^{who are mostly the sons of pashas} ~~the~~ ^{These} with few exceptions, suffer from the ~~the~~ bankruptcy of modern Egyptian life; ^{they are} able to take neither European culture nor their own Islamic traditions seriously. So far as I ^{can} make out from talking with the more intelligent of ^{them} ~~the~~ students, what Egypt asks for is a European government and education free of European political domination but ^{with a} ~~with~~ European technical personnel in the key positions, which it cannot do without and will pay highly for ~~the~~ ~~the~~. Egypt can never be a great independent spiritual or political force in the Near East, but because of its wealth it can become at least the commercial centre of Islamic orthodoxy. Turkey is already a modern European country; Egypt will remain for ^{some time yet eighteenth-century spirit} ~~the~~ a compromise between political romanticism and ~~the~~ religious classicism ~~the~~. For a generation or two yet the descendants of the landowners enriched by European administration will continue "to spend their times in cafés longing for women" and to be "perplexed and annoyed by the length of daytime," while "the happy peasants" go on "toiling afar from the multitude of town life." And my professional successors will continue to become "fatigable and fond of leisure."

For I had already decided to resign. So had the professor of Latin, my only English colleague. And the one-legged professor of French Literature who was an honest man. The others stayed on.

The Egyptians ^{were most} hospitable. I attended one heavy banquet at the Samiramis Hotel given by the Minister of Education. Tall Sudanese waiters dressed in red robes brought in a succession of the most magnificent dishes ^{concocts} that I have seen anywhere, even on the films. I remember particularly a great model of the Cairo Citadel in ice with the doors and windows filled with caviare which one scooped out with a golden Moorish spoon. I heard recently that this banquet, which must have cost thousands, has not yet been paid for. I found little to do in Egypt (since I had no intention of mixing with the British official class) joining the golf club or ^{paying} official ^{calls} but eat coffee-ices at Groppi's, visit the open-air cinemas and sit at home in ^{our} flat at Heliopolis and get on with writing. My sister, who lived near, continued sisterly. During the ^{season of} the Khamsin, a hot wind which sent the temperature up on one occasion to 113° in the shade, I put the finishing touches to a book called Lars Porsena or The Future of Swearing and Improper Language. I also worked on a study of the English ballad. The best thing that I saw in Egypt was the face of old King Seti, the Good, unwrapped of its mummy-cloths, in the Cairo Museum, ^{Nearly all} the best things in Egypt ^{funniest} were dead. The thing most was a French bedroom farce played in Arabic by Syrian actors in a native theatre. The men and women ~~part~~ of the cast had, for religious reasons, to keep on opposite sides of the stage; ~~the men on the left and the women on the right.~~

~~They sang French songs (in translation) varying the ~~melody~~ with ~~the~~ quarter-tones and shrieks and trills of their own ~~music~~. The audience talked all the time and ate peanuts, oranges, sunflower-seeds and heads of lettuces.~~

I went to call on Lord Lloyd just before the end of the academic year, which was at the end of May; ^{some of it was done at the Residency.} ~~he~~ invited me to ~~bridge~~. I won twenty piastres off him at bridge and was told to collect it from his A.D.G. He asked me how I found Egypt and I said, "All right," with an intonation that made him catch me up quickly, "Only all right?" That was all ^{he believed in his job more than I did in mine.} that passed between us. ~~He~~ used to drive through Cairo in a powerful car, with a Union Jack flying from it, at about sixty miles an hour. He had motor-cyclist outriders to clear the way—Sir Lee Stack, the Sirdar, had been killed the year before while driving through Cairo, ^{and a} traffic jam had materially helped his assassin~~s~~. One day I was shown the spot where it happened near the Ministry of Education; there was a crowd at the spot which I ^{at first took ~~for~~} a party of sightseers, but the ^{proved to be} attraction ~~was~~ a naked woman lying on the pavement ~~and waving her arms~~ laughing wildly. ^{and waving her arms} She was one of the hashish dope-cases that were very common in Egypt. The crowd ^{was jeering} ~~had gathered round to stare at~~ her; ~~the~~ policeman a few yards off ^{paid} ~~no~~ attention.

I attended a Revee at the Abdin Palace, King Fuad's Cairo residence. ^{It} ~~the~~ began early at nine o'clock in the morning. ~~The~~ King gave honourable precedence to the staff of the University; ^{soon} ~~it~~ came in ~~after~~ the diplomatic corps ^{and the Ministers of the Crown} and some time before the army. While still in England I had been warned to buy suitable clothes -- a morning coat and trousers ^{for} this occasion. To be really correct ^{my coat} ~~one~~ should have had green facings, green being the national colour of Egypt, but I was told that this would not be insisted upon. Opinions differed greatly as to what was suitable Court-dress; ^{most of} the French professors ~~were~~ arrived in full evening dress with swallow-tail coats and white waistcoats, others ~~had~~^{wore} ordinary dinner jackets. Most of them had ~~top~~^{opera}-hats; they all ~~had~~^{had} decorations round their necks. They looked like stragglers from an all-night fancy-dress ball.

~~After signing my name in the~~^{The two large hotel-registers, one belonging to the King, the other to the Queen, I was given a refreshing rice-drink, a courtesy of the Queen's. I then} ~~the Day of Judgment,~~ I went up the noble marble staircase. On every other step stood an enormous black soldier, royally uniformed, with a lance in his hand. My soldier's eye commented on their somewhat listless attitudes; but no doubt they pulled themselves smartly to attention when the Egyptian Army General Staff went past. I had been warned that when I met King Fuad I must not be surprised at anything extraordinary I heard; a When he was a child his family had been shot up by an assassin employed by interested relatives; and Fuad had taken cover under a table and, though wounded, had survived.

~~curious~~

wheezing cry ~~that~~^{was apt to} burst from his throat occasionally when he was nervous. We were moved from room to room. At last a quiet ~~looking~~^{-looking} Turkish gentleman of middle age wearing ~~regulation~~ Court dress, greeted us ~~deprentially~~ in French. I took him for the ~~professor~~ Grand Chamberlain. I bowed and said the same thing in French as the professor in front of me had said, and expected ~~to~~^{next} be led to the Throne Room.

~~on~~ But ~~I found that the~~^{The next stage was the cloak-room one more:} I had already met King Fuad. ~~And no Eastern magnificence or wheezing cry.~~

I attended a royal soirée a few days later. The chief event was a theatrical variety show. The performance was predominantly Italian. King Fuad had been educated in Italy, where he ~~had~~^{attained} the rank of captain in the Italian cavalry, and had a great regard for Italian culture. (He was ignorant of English but was a good French scholar.) The performance belonged to the 1870's. There was a ^{discreet} blonde shepherdess who ^{did a hopping dance in ankle-length} ~~skirts and a~~ ^{discreet} ~~tenor~~ ^{confined} who ~~expressed~~ his passion ~~highly~~ ^{to} by his top notes; and there was a ^{well-behaved} ~~comedian~~ who made ^{nice little jokes for the Queen} ~~himself~~. I clapped him because I liked ^{him better than the others} ~~himself~~, and everybody looked round at me; I realised that I had done the wrong thing. An official whispered to me that it was a command performance and ^{that} the actors therefore were entitled to no applause. Unless His Majesty ^{was himself amused} ~~approved~~ the turns must be greeted in silence. I was wearing Court dress again, but not to be outdone by the Frenchmen I ^{had put on} ~~wore~~ my three campaigning medals, and wished that I had that St. Anne of the Third ~~Class~~ with the crossed swords. And the refreshments! I will not attempt to describe ^{the} ~~the~~ Arabian Night buffet; ~~it was so splendid indeed~~ that it has remained ~~as~~ a mere blur in my memory. I pocketed some particularly ^{fantastic} ~~delicious~~ confections to bring home to the children.

What caused me most surprise in Egypt was the ~~great number~~ ^{great number} of camels there. ~~I had~~ ^{had} ~~never~~ ^{of them only as} seen ~~one~~ ^{one} before. I ~~thought~~ ^{thought} that ~~they were not~~ ^{they were not} ~~in~~ ⁱⁿ the picture ~~of~~ ^{of} ~~the~~ ^{the} ~~land~~ ^{land} ~~of~~ ^{of} ~~the~~ ^{the} ~~East~~ ^{East}. I ~~did~~ ^{had not} ~~not~~ ^{not} expect to see thousands of them in the streets of Cairo, ^{holding up the motor-traffic - in} ~~in~~ long trains, tied head to rump, with great sacks of green fodder on their backs.

Our children were a great anxiety. They had to drink boiled milk and boiled water and ~~be~~ ^{be} watched all the time to prevent them ^{from} taking off their topees and ~~their~~ blue veils. ^{Then they} ~~all~~ ^{got measles} ~~of~~ ^{of} ~~them~~ ^{them} and were carried off to an isolation hospital, where ^{they were} ~~the hospital~~ ~~fed~~ on all the things that we had been particular since their birth not to give them, and ~~and~~ ~~_____~~. They returned very thin and wretched-looking and we wondered if we should ever get them ~~_____~~ safely ^{home}. We booked our passages ~~_____~~ some time at the end of May. We had only just enough money to ~~_____~~ ^{for} third class in a small Italian boat with a cargo of onions. We ^{disembarked at} ~~_____~~ Venice and stopped a day there. ^{After Egypt} Venice ^{seemed like heaven. It would never again be to me}

~~_____~~
~~_____~~

I had a European egg in Venice. ~~_____~~ Egyptian eggs were about the size of a pigeon's egg and always tasted strongly of the garlic which seemed to form a large part of the diet of the Egyptian ~~_____~~ fowl.

There are plenty of caricature scenes to look back on in Egypt. Among them, for instance, myself dressed in my smart yellow gaberdine suit ^{and} ~~_____~~ ^{cornered} in the ^{Faculty Conference-room.} seated at a long baize ^{table.}
In front of me is a cup of Turkish coffee, a sun helmet and a long ~~_____~~ ^{record} in French ^{(of the minutes of the last meeting).}. I am talking angry bad French at my Belgian and French colleagues in support of ~~_____~~ the young professor of Latin who has just leaped to his feet, ^{pale} ~~_____~~ ^{hates} with ~~_____~~. He is declaring ^{in worse French} that he positively refuses to ^{make a forced contribution} ~~_____~~ of fifty piastres ~~_____~~ to a memorial wreath for one of the Frenchmen (who has just died) ^{since he was never consulted.} ~~_____~~ ~~_____~~ I am declaring that neither will I, ^{blustering to him in English} that so far as I am concerned all dead Frenchmen can go bury themselves at their own expense. The ~~_____~~ ^{lofty elegant} room, once a harem drawing-room; a portrait of the late Khedive, with a large ^{rent} ~~_____~~ in it, hanging ^{at a} ~~_____~~ carried off to an isolation hospital, where ^{they were} ~~_____~~ ^{led} ~~_____~~ on all the things that we had been ^{particular since their birth not to give them; and} ~~_____~~ ^{They} ~~_____~~ returned very thin and wretched-looking and we wondered if we should ever get them ^{back} safely. We booked our passages some time at the end of May. We had only just enough money ^{for} ~~_____~~ third class in a small Italian boat with a cargo of onions. We ^{disembarked at} ~~_____~~ Venice and stopped a ^{day there. Venice} ~~_____~~ ^{what it was that day} ~~_____~~

I had a European egg in Venice. ~~_____~~ Egyptian eggs were about the size of a pigeon's egg and always tasted strongly of the garlic which seemed to form a large part of the diet of the Egyptian ~~_____~~. There are plenty of caricature scenes to look back on in Egypt. Among them, for instance, myself dressed in my smart yellow gabardine suit seated at a long table ^{in the} ~~_____~~ in front of me is a cup of Turkish coffee, a sun helmet and a long ^{of the remnants of the last meeting} ~~_____~~ in French. I am talking angry bad French at my Belgian and French colleagues in support of the young professor of Latin who has just leaped to his feet ^{in some French} ~~_____~~ with ^{himself} ~~_____~~. He is declaring that he positively refuses to ^{make a forced contribution} ~~_____~~ of fifty piastres to a memorial wreath for one of the ^{since he has never married} ~~_____~~ Frenchmen (who has just died) ^{is} ~~_____~~ I am declaring that neither will I, that so far as I am concerned all dead Frenchmen can go bury themselves at their own expense. The ^{of the region} ~~_____~~ room, once a harem drawing-room; a portrait of the late Khedive, with a large ^{rent} ~~_____~~ in it hanging tipsy slant

Lat one end of the room; at the other a large glass show-case full of ^{Egyptian} Roman brass coins all ^{muddled} together, ~~with~~ their labels ^{lost} in one corner. Through the window ~~to~~ market gardens, ~~and~~ buffaloes, ~~and~~ camels, ~~and~~ countrywomen in black. Around the table my horrified ^{shrugging} colleagues, turning to each other ~~and~~ and saying, "^{inoui... inoui...}"

And outside the rebellious shouts of ^{our} students ~~working~~ ^{themselves} up for another strike.

D

The rest makes no more than conversation

~~_____~~
~~_____~~ d -- of the government clerk who was so doubly unfortunate as to be run over by a racing-car and to find that the driver was the eldest son of the Minister of Justice; ~~_____~~
~~_____~~

~~_____~~ and of the rich girl ^{in search of a husband} who went as paying guest at fifteen guineas a week to the ^{senior} government official's wife, ~~_____~~ agreeing ~~_____~~ to pay for all wines and cigars and extras when ^{smart} society came to dine, and ~~_____~~ ^{who meeting only senior government officials and their wives complained that she had not got her money's} worth; and of my ~~_____~~ night visit to the ~~_____~~ temple of a headless monkey-god, full of bats; and of the ^{English} cotton manufacturer who defended the conditions in his factory on the ground that the population of Egypt since the British came had been increasing far too rapidly ~~_____~~

~~_____~~ ^{and} that pulmonary consumption was one of the few checks on it ~~_____~~; and of 'The Limit' so named by Australians during the war, who told my ^{fortune} by moonlight under the ^{long} shadow of the pyramid of Cheops; and of the Arab cab-driver who was kind to his horses; and of my visit to Chamki Bey, the national poet of Egypt, in his Moorish mansion by the Nile, ^{who was so like Thomas Hardy} and in whose presence his sons, like good Turks, sat dutifully silent; and of the ^{beggar} ~~_____~~ in the Bazaar ^{with too many toes} and of the ^{veiled vengeance there} ~~_____~~ who tried to touch us; ~~_____~~

~~_____~~ and of the official ^{and} who, during the war, had played Joseph, ^{on a dream of death} dumping half the wheat of Australia in Egypt, where it found no buyers and was at last eaten by donkeys and camels; ^{and} who told me that the whole secret of vivid writing ~~_____~~ was to use the active rather than the passive voice, ^{Amr-ibn-el-Aas} to say "~~_____~~ conquered Egypt" rather than "Egypt was conquered by ~~_____~~" ^{Amr-ibn-el-Aas}; and of Heliopolis a brand-new dead town, built by ~~_____~~

and of the student's mother who, at the _____ said how much she regretted having put her on the marble floor at the _____ (being only twelve years old) to play with her dolls;

and of a visit to ancient Heliopolis with its lovely landscape of green fields, its crooked palm-trees, its water-wheels, pushed by oxen and its single clock; on the desert's edge a Belgian company, complete with a race-course and a Lunatic Park, where the R.A.F. planes ^{flew} low at night among the houses, and where the bored wives of ^{disappointed} officials ^{wrote} ~~novels~~ ^{which they never finishes} and painted a little in water-colours; ~~and~~

~~and of the little garden of~~ ^{our} flat where I went walking on the first day among the fruit trees and flowering shrubs and how I came upon no less than eight lean and mangy cats dozing in the beds and never walked there again; and of the numerous kites, their foul counterpart in the sky and in the palm trees; and lastly of that ^{fabulous} ~~cross-breed~~ cross-breed between kite and cat which woke us every morning at dawn, ~~kept~~ kept as a pet in a neighbouring tenement inhabited by Syrians and Greeks, ~~whose~~ ~~strangled~~ ^{cock-a-doodle-doo} ~~strangled~~ ~~strangled~~ ~~was to me the dawn-cry of modern Egypt.~~ (Empty cigar-box - no applause - and thank you)

^{So back to slip; much} PP ~~to~~ to the disappointment of my parents, who thought that I had at last ~~seen~~ ^{seen} reason and settled down to ~~an~~ ^{an} appointment suited ^{equally} to my needs and my talents; ^{and} ~~much~~ ^{undisputed} to the relief of my sister-in-law.

CHAPTER XXIX.

Poem Wanted (6512) - Does any reader know a poem which describes life as a lump of clay which, with a bag of tools, man can fashion into a stumbling block or a stepping stone?

(Reader's query in John o' London's Weekly.)

^{And now} [redacted] the last chapter; [redacted] necessarily a short [redacted] because 1926 was the beginning of yesterday [redacted] [redacted] In January [redacted] when things began to stop happening in an autobiographical way. There only remained to tidy a few things up. In 1926 when we came back Nancy's health was very much better, but ^{none of us had any} [redacted] money left. [redacted] ^{There were} [redacted] a number of books, ^{to be sold} chiefly autographed first editions of modern poets; and Lawrence [redacted] came to the rescue with a copy of his Seven Pillars marked, "Please sell when read," ^{which} [redacted] fetched over three hundred pounds. [redacted] [redacted] Jonathan Cape wrote ^{to me} suggesting that I should write ^{a school-adventure story about} [redacted] Lawrence. [redacted] There was not much time to do it ^{- to have it ready} [redacted] for autumn publication (about two months), -- and Lawrence was in India and I had to get his permission and send parts of the manuscript there for him to read and pass. Lowell Thomas anticipated me with a Boy's Book of ^{Colonel} Lawrence, so I decided to make mine a general book, ^{three} [redacted] ^{times the} length ^{of his,} [redacted] working eighteen hours a day at it. Most of those to whom I wrote for information about Lawrence, including His Majesty the King, gave me their help. The only rebuff I got was from ^{George} Bernard Shaw, who wrote me the following postcard :-

"Ayot St. Lawrence,
Welwyn, Herts.

8th June, 1927.

"A great mistake. You might as well try to write a funny book about Mark Twain. T.E. has got all out of himself that is to be got. His name will rouse expectations which you will necessarily disappoint. Cape will curse his folly for proposing such a thing, and never give you another commission. Write a book (if you must) about the dullest person you know: clerical if possible. Give yourself a chance.

G.B.S."

Just before Christmas the book was selling at the rate of ten thousand copies a week. I heard later that Shaw had mistaken me for my ^{Daily Mail} brother.

Shortly afterwards I had a reply, delayed for nine months, to an application that I had made, when things were bad, for an appointment as English lecturer ⁱⁿ an Adult-Education scheme. I was told that my qualifications were not considered sufficient. By this time I had lost all my academic manners and wrote wishing the entire committee in Baluchistan, to be tickled to death by wild butterflies.

In 1927, in a process of tidying-up, I published a collected book of my poems. One of the later ones began :

"This I admit, Death is terrible to me,
To no man more so, naturally.
And I have disenthralled my natural terror
Of every comfortable philosopher
Or tall dark doctor of divinity.
Death stands at last in his true rank and order."

The book was selective rather than collective, intended as a disavowal of over half the poetry that I had ^{so far} printed

~~As Skelton told Fame, speaking of his regretted poem Apollo Whirléd up his Chair, I had done what I could to scrape out the scrolls, To erase it for ever out of her ragman's rolls.~~

^{But} I still permitted anthologists to print some

"Ayot St. Lawrence,
Wolwyn, Harza.

8th June, 1927.

"A great mistake. You might as well try to write a funny book about Mark Twain. T.E. has got all out of himself that is to be got. His name will rouse expectations which you will necessarily disappoint. Gaps will cause his folly for proposing such a thing, and never give you another commission. Write a book (if you must) about the dullest person you know: clerical if possible.
Give yourself a chance.

Why make the "exception"! You say Just before Christmas the book was selling at the rate of ten thousand copies a week. I heard later that Shaw had mistaken me for my brother.
They will all feel thrilled and apprehensive - excuse me!

Shortly afterwards I had a reply, delayed for nine months, to an application that I had made, when things were bad, for an appointment as English lecturer at an adult-Education scheme. I was told that my qualifications were not considered sufficient. By this time I had lost all my academic manners and wrote wishing the entire committee in Baluchistan to be tickled to death by wild butterflies.
In 1927 in a process of tidying-up I published a collected book of my poems. One of the later ones began:

"This I admit, Death is terrible to me,
To no man more so, naturally.
And I have disenthralled my natural terror
Of every controllable philosopher
Or tall dark doctor of divinity.
Death stands at last in his true rank and order."

The book was selective rather than collective, intended as a disavowal of over half the poetry that I had printed.
As Skelton told some speaking of his regretted poem Apollo Whirled up his Chair, I had done what I could to scrape out the scrolls. To erase it for ever out of her ragman's rolls.
I still permitted anthologists to print some of the rejected pieces if they paid highly enough ~~_____~~

~~_____~~. On the other hand I stopped contributing new poems to English and American periodicals. I did not tidy up my critical writings, but let them go out of print. In 1927 I ~~_____~~ began learning to print on a hand-press. In 1928 I continued learning to print.

^{On May 6th} ~~_____~~ 1929 Nancy and I ^{suddenly} parted company. I had already finished with nearly ^{all} ~~_____~~ ^{my} other leading and subsidiary characters in this story and dozens more whom I have not troubled to put in ^{T.E., Shaw now not} but Lawrence remained, ^{still as good as good} ~~_____~~
~~_____~~ I began to write ^{my autobiography} ~~_____~~ on May 23rd and write these words on July 24th, ^{another month of final review & shall have printed with myself for good} my thirty-fourth birthday. ~~_____~~ I have been able to draw on contemporary records for most of the facts, but in many passages ~~_____~~ memory has been the only source. My memory is good but not perfect. ~~_____~~
For instance, ^{I can,} after two hearings remember the tune and words of any song that I like and never afterwards forget them; but there are always ^{and} ~~_____~~ discrepancies between my version and the original. So here ^{there must be} ~~_____~~ many slight errors pointed out to me. No incidents ^{however,} are invented or embellished; some are no doubt in their wrong order: I am uncertain for example, of the exact date and place of the megaphoned trench-conversation between the Royal Welch and the Germans, though I have a contemporary record of it. I am not sure of some of the less important names (even of ^{Lance-corporal} Baxter's, but it was at least a name like Baxter). To avoid ^{the suggestion of} libel ~~_____~~
I have ~~_____~~ disguised six names. ~~_____~~
~~_____~~ ^{Also, I make a general disclaimer of} ~~_____~~ such opinions as I have recorded myself as holding from chapter to chapter on education, ^{nature,} war, religion, literature.

of the rejected pieces if they paid highly enough
 On the other hand I stopped contributing new poems to English and American periodicals. I did not tidy up my critical writings but let them go out of print. In 1927 I began learning to print on a hand-press. In 1928 I continued learning to print.
 In 1929 Nancy and I parted company. I had already finished with nearly all other leading and subsidiary characters in this story and dozens more whom I have not troubled to put in - but Lawrence remained.
 I began to write on May 23rd and write these words on July 24th, my thirty-fourth birthday. I have been able to draw on contemporary records for most of the facts, but in many passages my memory has been the only source. My memory is good but not perfect.
 For instance, after two hearings remember the tune and words of any song that I like and never afterwards forget them; but there are always discrepancies between my version and the original. So here. No incidents are invented or embellished; some are no doubt in their wrong order: I am uncertain for example, of the exact date and place of the mentioned French-conversation between the Royal Welch and the Germans, though I have a contemporary record of it. I am not sure of some of the less important names (even of lance-corporal Baxter's, but it was at least a name like Baxter). To avoid libel
 I have disguised six names.
 opinions as I have recorded myself as holding from chapter to chapter on education, war, religion, literature.

philosophy, psychology, ^{politics,} and so on.

^{of what I was, not what I am.}
This is a story

Wherever I have used autobiographical material in previous books and it does not tally with ^{what I have written} here, this is the ^{story} and that was ^{literature}.

I find myself wondering whether it is ^{a good} story. Yet I seem to have done most of the usual story-book things. I had by the age of twenty-three been born, initiated into a formal religion, travelled, learned to lie, loved unhappily, been married, gone to the war, taken life, procreated my kind, rejected formal religion, ^{won fame} and been killed. At the age of thirty-four ^{still remain} many things undone. For instance, I have never been on a journey of exploration, or in a submarine, aeroplane or civil court of law (except a magistrate's court on the charge of 'riding a vehicle, to wit a bicycle, without ^{proper illumination, to wit} a rear lamp'). I have never mastered any musical instrument, starved, committed civil murder, found buried treasure, engaged in unnatural vice, slept with a prostitute, or seen a corpse that has died a natural death. On the other hand I have ridden on a locomotive, won a prize at the Olympic Games, become a member of the senior common room at one Oxford College before becoming a member of the junior common room at another, been examined by the police on suspicion of attempted murder, passed at dusk in a hail-storm within half a mile of Stromboli when it was in eruption, had a statue of myself erected in my lifetime in a London Park, and learned to tell the truth—^{nearly}.

DEDICATORY EPILOGUE

TO

LAURA RIDING.

I have used your World's End as an introductory motto but You will ^{be glad to} find no reference at all to yourself in the body of this book. I have not ~~mentioned~~ mentioned the Survey of Modernist Poetry and the Pamphlet against Anthologies as works of collaboration between you and me, though these books appear in published ^{no} catalogues and obviously put much of my own previous critical writing out of account. And though I have mentioned printing I have not given details of it, or even said that it was ~~with you~~ with you, printing and publishing ^{in partnership} as The Seizin Press. Because of you the last chapters have a ghostly look.

The reason ^{of all this} ~~is~~ ^{(of course,} is that by mentioning you as a character in my autobiography I would seem to be denying you in your true quality of one living invisibly against kind, ~~as~~ as dead, beyond event. And yet the ^{silence} ~~is~~ is false if it make the book seem to have been written ^{from where I was} forward instead of backward ^{from where you are}. If the direction of the book were forward I should still be inside the body of it, arguing morals, literature, politics, suffering violent physical experiences, falling in and out of love, making and losing friends, enduring blindly in time: instead of here outside, writing this letter to you, as one ^{also} living against kind ~~is~~ - indeed rather against myself.

You know the autobiography of that Lord Herbert of Cherbury, whose son founded the Royal Welch Fusiliers; how he was educated as a gentleman, studied at Oxford, married young, travelled, played games, fought in Northern France and wrote books; until at last his active life ended with a sudden clap of thunder from the blue sky which did "so comfort and cheer* him that he resolved at last, at this sign, to print his book De Veritate, Concerning Truth. If you were to appear in my De Veritate it could only be as this loud though yet gentle noise,... one fair day in the summer, my casement being opened towards the south, the sun shining clear, and no wind stirring.

For could the story of your coming be told between an Islip Parish Council meeting and a conference of the professors of the Faculty of Letters at Cairo University? How ~~she~~^{she} and I happening by seeming accident upon your teasing Guida were drawn to write to you, who were in America, asking you to come to us. How, though you knew no more of us than we of you, and indeed less (for you knew me at a disadvantage, by my poems of the war_x), you forthwith came. And how there was thereupon a ⁿunity to which you and I pledged our faith and she her pleasure. How we went together to the land where the dead parade the streets and there met with demons and returned with the demons still treading behind. And how they drove us up and down the land.

That ~~was~~^{was} the beginning of the end, and the end and after is yours. Yet I must relieve your parable of all anecdote of mine. ~~for instance~~^{I must tell,} that in its ^{extreme} course, in April last, I relived the changes of many past years. That when I must suddenly hurry off to Ireland I found myself on the very boat, from Fishguard, that had been my hospital-boat twelve years before. That at Limerick I met Old Ireland herself sitting black-shawled and mourning on the station bench^{and telling of the Fall}. And so to the Beautiful City of Sligo celebrated in song by my father. And the next train back, this time by the Wales of the Royal Welch

Fusiliers. And the next day to Rouen with you and ^{her} [redacted] to recollect the hill-top where you seemed to die as the one on which I had seemed to die thirteen years before. And then immediately back. And then, later in the same month, my sudden journey to Hilton in Huntingdon, to a farm with memories of ^{her} [redacted] as I first knew her, to burst in ^{up} on - as it happened - David Garnett (whom I had never met before); gulping his vintage port and scandalizing him with my soldier's oaths as I denied him a speaking part in ^{your} [redacted] parable [redacted].

After which.

After which anecdotes of yours, travesties of the parable and so precious to me as vulgar glosses on it. How ^{on April 27th, 1929} it was a fourth story window and a stone area and you were ^{dying} [redacted]. And how it was a joke between Harold the stretcher bearer ^{& myself} that you did not die ^{but survived your dying brief-interval.} [redacted].

After which.

After which may I recall, since you ^{would} (not care to do so yourself, with what professional ^{appreciation (on May 16th)} [redacted] Mr. Lake is reported to have observed to those that stood by him in the operating-theatre, "It is rarely that one sees the spinal-chord exposed to view especially at right angles to itself."

After which.

After which let me also recall on my own account my story The Shout, which though written two years ^{ago} [redacted] belongs here; [redacted] blind and slow like all prophecies it has left you ^{out} [redacted] entirely out. ^{And,} [redacted] because you are left out [redacted]

! anecdote of mine.

After which.

After which even anecdotes fail. No more anecdotes. And of course no more politics, religion, conversations, literature, arguments, dances, drunks, time, crowds, games, fun, unhappiness. I no longer repeat to myself, "He who shall endure to the end, shall be saved." It is enough now to say that I have endured. My lung, barometric still of ^{soul} weather, speaks of endurance, as your spine, barometric of ^{fair} weather, speaks of salvation.
